English Men of Letters Edited by John Morley

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

Wordsworth

to

FREDERICK W. H. MYERS

English Aden of Letters

we draid: THEOR AROL

ARPER SO BROTHERS PUBLISHERS EW YORK AND LONDON 1993

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

I AND EDUCATION.—CAMBRIDGE	1
CHAPTER II.
DENCE IN LONDON AND IN FRANCE	14
CHAPTER III.
WORDSWORTH.—LYRICAL BALLADS.—SETTLEMENT
Grasmere	25
CHAPTER IV.
English Lakes	38
CHAPTER V.
RIAGE.—SOCIETY.—HIGHLAND TOUR	55
CHAPTER VI.
EORGE BEAUMONT.—DEATH OF JOHN WORDSWORTH	65
CHAPTER VII.
PPY WARRIOR," AND PATRIOTIC POEMS	74

CHAPTER VIII.
CHILDREN.—LIFE AT RYDAL MOUNT.—"THE EXCURSION" 84
CHAPTER IX.
POETIC DICTION.—"LAODAMIA."—"EVENING ODE" 103
CHAPTER X.
Natural Religion
CHAPTER XI.
Italian Tour.—Ecclesiastical Sonnets.—Political Views.—Laureateship
CHAPTER XII.
LETTERS ON THE KENDAL AND WINDERMERE RAILWAY.
—CONCLUSION

WORDSWORTH.

CHAPTER I.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION .- CAMBRIDGE.

мот, perhaps, more fitly begin this short biography with some words in which its subject has expressed wn feelings as to the spirit in which such a task l be approached. "Silence," says Wordsworth, "is ilege of the grave, a right of the departed: let him, ore, who infringes that right by speaking publicly , or against those who cannot speak for themselves, need that he opens not his mouth without a suffisanction. Only to philosophy enlightened by the afas does it belong justly to estimate the claims of the ed, on the one hand, and of the present age and futenerations, on the other, and to strike a balance bethem. Such philosophy runs a risk of becoming t among us, if the coarse intrusions into the recesses, oss breaches upon the sanctities, of domestic life, to we have lately been more and more accustomed, are regarded as indications of a vigorous state of public g. The wise and good respect, as one of the noblest teristics of Englishmen, that jealousy of familiar approach which, while it contributes to the maintenance of private dignity, is one of the most efficacious guardians of rational public freedom."

In accordance with these views the poet entrusted to his nephew, the present Bishop of Lincoln, the task of composing memoirs of his life, in the just confidence that nothing would by such hands be given to the world which was inconsistent with the dignity either of the living or of the dead. From those memoirs the facts contained in the present work have been for the most part drawn. has, however, been my fortune, through hereditary friendships, to have access to many manuscript letters and much oral tradition bearing upon the poet's private life; and some details and some passages of letters hitherto unpublished will appear in these pages. It would seem, however, that there is but little of public interest in Wordsworth's life which has not already been given to the world. and I have shrunk from narrating such minor personal incidents as he would himself have thought it needless to dwell upon. I have endeavoured, in short, to write as though the Subject of this biography were himself its Auditor, listening, indeed, from some region where all of truth is discerned and nothing but truth desired, but checking by his venerable presence any such revelation as public advantage does not call for, and private delicacy would condemn.

As regards the critical remarks which these pages contain, I have only to say that I have carefully consulted such notices of the poet as his personal friends have left

&lt;sup>1</sup> I take this opportunity of thanking Mr. William Wordsworth, the son, and Mr. William Wordsworth, the grandson, of the poet, for help most valuable in enabling me to give a true impression of the poet's personality.

l also, I believe, nearly every criticism of importance has appeared on his works. I find with pleasure considerable agreement of opinion exists—though nong professed poets or critics than among men of ace in other departments of thought or action whose on has been directed to Wordsworth's poems. And gh I have felt it right to express in each case my iews with exactness, I have been able to feel that I t obtruding on the reader any merely fanciful estin which better accredited judges would refuse to hout further preface I now begin my story of worth's life, in words which he himself dictated to tended biographer. "I was born," he said, "at mouth, in Cumberland, on April 7th, 1770, the secn of John Wordsworth, attorney-at-law—as lawyers class were then called-and law-agent to Sir James er, afterwards Earl of Lonsdale. My mother was only daughter of William Cookson, mercer, of Pennd of Dorothy, born Crackanthorp, of the ancient of that name, who from the times of Edward the had lived in Newbiggen Hall, Westmoreland. ather was the first of the name of Wordsworth who into Westmoreland, where he purchased the small of Sockbridge. He was descended from a family ad been settled at Peniston, in Yorkshire, near the s of the Don, probably before the Norman Conquest. names appear on different occasions in all the trans-, personal and public, connected with that parish; possess, through the kindness of Colonel Beaumont, ery, made in 1525, at the expense of a William worth, as is expressed in a Latin inscription carved t, which carries the pedigree of the family back four 1* generations from himself. The time of my infancy and early boyhood was passed partly at Cockermouth, and partly with my mother's parents at Penrith, where my mother, in the year 1778, died of a decline, brought on by a cold, in consequence of being put, at a friend's house in London, in what used to be called 'a best bedroom.' My father never recovered his usual cheerfulness of mind after this loss, and died when I was in my fourteenth year, a school-boy, just returned from Hawkshead, whither I had been sent with my elder brother Richard, in my ninth year.

"I remember my mother only in some few situations, one of which was her pinning a nosegay to my breast, when I was going to say the catechism in the church, as was customary before Easter. An intimate friend of hers told me that she once said to her that the only one of her five children about whose future life she was anxious was William; and he, she said, would be remarkable, either for good or for evil. The cause of this was that I was of a stiff, moody, and violent temper; so much so that I remember going once into the attics of my grandfather's house at Penrith, upon some indignity having been put upon me, with an intention of destroying myself with one of the foils which I knew was kept there. I took the foil in hand, but my heart failed. Upon another occasion, while I was at my grandfather's house at Penrith, along with my eldest brother, Richard, we were whipping tops together in the large drawing-room, on which the carpet was only laid down upon particular occasions. The walls were hung round with family pictures, and I said to my brother, 'Dare you strike your whip through that old lady's petticoat?' He replied, 'No, I won't.' 'Then,' said I, 'here goes!' and I struck my lash through her hooped petticoat; for which, no doubt, though I have forgotten it, I was properly punished. But, possibly from some want of judgment in punishments inflicted, I had become perverse and obstinate in defying chastisement, and rather proud of it than otherwise.

"Of my earliest days at school I have little to say, but that they were very happy ones, chiefly because I was left at liberty then, and in the vacations, to read whatever books I liked. For example, I read all Fielding's works, Don Quixote, Gil Blas, and any part of Swift that I liked -Gulliver's Travels, and the Tale of a Tub, being both much to my taste. It may be, perhaps, as well to mention that the first verses which I wrote were a task imposed by my master-the subject, The Summer Vacation; and of my own accord I added others upon Return to School. There was nothing remarkable in either poem; but I was called upon, among other scholars, to write verses upon the completion of the second centenary from the foundation of the school in 1585 by Archbishop Sandys. These verses were much admired—far more than they deserved, for they were but a tame imitation of Pope's versification, and a little in his style."

But it was not from exercises of this kind that Wordsworth's school-days drew their inspiration. No years of his life, perhaps, were richer in strong impressions; but they were impressions derived neither from books nor from companions, but from the majesty and loveliness of the scenes around him;—from Nature, his life-long mistress, loved with the first heats of youth. To her influence we shall again recur; it will be most convenient first to trace Wordsworth's progress through the curriculum of ordinary education.

It was due to the liberality of Wordsworth's two uncles, Richard Wordsworth and Christopher Crackanthorp (under whose care he and his brothers were placed at their father's death, in 1783), that his education was prolonged beyond his school-days. For Sir James Lowther, afterwards Lord Lonsdale-whose agent Wordsworth's father, Mr. John Wordsworth, was-becoming aware that his agent had about 5000l, at the bank, and wishing, partly on political grounds, to make his power over him absolute, had forcibly borrowed this sum of him, and then refused to repay it. After Mr. John Wordsworth's death much of the remaining fortune which he left behind him was wasted in efforts to compel Lord Lonsdale to refund this sum; but it was never recovered till his death in 1801, when his successor repaid 8500l. to the Wordsworths, being a full acquittal, with interest, of the original debt. The fortunes of the Wordsworth family were, therefore, at a low ebb in 1787, and much credit is due to the uncles who discerned the talents of William and Christopher, and bestowed a Cambridge education on the future Poet Laureate, and the future Master of Trinity.

In October, 1787, then, Wordsworth went up as an undergraduate to St. John's College, Cambridge. The first court of this College, in the south-western corner of which were Wordsworth's rooms, is divided only by a narrow lane from the Chapel of Trinity College, and his first memories are of the Trinity clock, telling the hours "twice over, with a male and female voice," of the pealing organ, and of the prospect when

"From my pillow looking forth, by light
Of moon or favouring stars I could behold
The antechapel, where the statue stood
Of Newton with his prism and silent face,
The marble index of a mind for ever
Voyaging through strange seas of Thought, alone."

For the most part, the recollections which Wordsworth brought away from Cambridge are such as had already found expression more than once in English literature; for it has been the fortune of that ancient University to receive in her bosom most of that long line of poets who form the peculiar glory of our English speech. Spenser, Ben Jonson, and Marlowe; Dryden, Cowley, and Waller; Milton, George Herbert, and Gray-to mention only the most familiar names—had owed allegiance to that mother who received Wordsworth now, and Coleridge and Byron immediately after him. "Not obvious, not obtrusive, she;" but yet her sober dignity has often seemed no unworthy setting for minds, like Wordsworth's, meditative without languor, and energies advancing without shock or storm. Never, perhaps, has the spirit of Cambridge been more truly caught than in Milton's Penseroso; for this poem obviously reflects the seat of learning which the poet had lately left, just as the Allegro depicts the cheerful rusticity of the Buckinghamshire village which was his new home. And thus the Penseroso was understood by Gray, who, in his Installation Ode, introduces Milton among the bards and sages who lean from heaven,

> "To bless the place where, on their opening soul, First the genuine ardour stole."

"'Twas Milton struck the deep-toned shell," and invoked with the old affection the scenes which witnessed his best and early years:

"Ye brown o'er-arching groves,
That contemplation loves,
Where willowy Camus lingers with delight!
Oft at the blush of dawn
I trod your level lawn,
Oft wooed the gleam of Cynthia silver-bright

In cloisters dim, far from the haunts of Folly, With Freedom by my side, and soft-eyed Melancholy."

And Wordsworth also "on the dry smooth-shaven green" paced on solitary evenings "to the far-off curfew's sound," beneath those groves of forest-trees among which "Philomel still deigns a song" and the spirit of contemplation lingers still; whether the silent avenues stand in the summer twilight filled with fragrance of the lime, or the long rows of chestnut engirdle the autumn river-lawns with walls of golden glow, or the tall elms cluster in garden or Wilderness into towering citadels of green. Beneath one exquisite ash-tree, wreathed with ivy, and hung in autumn with yellow tassels from every spray, Wordsworth used to linger long. "Scarcely Spenser's self," he tells us,

"Could have more tranquil visions in his youth, Or could more bright appearances create Of human forms with superhuman powers, Than I beheld loitering on calm, clear nights Alone, beneath this fairy work of earth."

And there was another element in Wordsworth's life at Cambridge more peculiarly his own—that exultation which a boy born among the mountains may feel when he perceives that the delight in the external world which the mountains have taught him has not perished by uprooting, nor waned for want of nourishment in field or fen; that even here, where nature is unadorned, and scenery, as it were, reduced to its elements—where the prospect is but the plain surface of the earth, stretched wide beneath an open heaven—even here he can still feel the early glow, can take delight in that broad and tranquil greenness, and in the august procession of the day.

"As if awakened, summoned, roused, constrained,
I looked for universal things; perused
The common countenance of earth and sky—
Earth, nowhere unembellished by some trace
Of that first Paradise whence man was driven;
And sky, whose beauty and bounty are expressed
By the proud name she bears—the name of Heaven."

Nor is it only in these open air scenes that Wordsworth has added to the long tradition a memory of his own. The "storied windows richly dight," which have passed into a proverb in Milton's song, cast in King's College Chapel the same "soft chequerings" upon their framework of stone while Wordsworth watched through the pauses of the anthem the winter afternoon's departing glow:

"Martyr, or King, or sainted Eremite, Whoe'er ye be that thus, yourselves unseen, Imbue your prison-bars with solemn sheen, Shine on until ye fade with coming Night."

From those shadowy seats whence Milton had heard "the pealing organ blow to the full-voiced choir below," Wordsworth too gazed upon—

"That branching roof Self-poised, and scooped into ten thousand cells Where light and shade repose, where music dwells Lingering, and wandering on as loth to die— Like thoughts whose very sweetness yieldeth proof That they were born for immortality."

Thus much, and more, there was of ennobling and unchangeable in the very aspect and structure of that ancient University, by which Wordsworth's mind was bent towards a kindred greatness. But of active moral and intellectual life there was at that time little to be found within her walls. The floodtide of her new life had not yet set in; she was still slumbering, as she had slumbered long, content to add to her majesty by the mere lapse of generations, and increment of her ancestral calm. Even had the intellectual life of the place been more stirring, it is doubtful how far Wordsworth would have been welcomed, or deserved to be welcomed, by authorities or students. began residence at seventeen, and his northern nature was late to flower. There seems, in fact, to have been even less of visible promise about him than we should have expected; but rather something untamed and insubordinate, something heady and self-confident; an independence that seemed only rusticity, and an indolent ignorance which assumed too readily the tones of scorn. He was as yet a creature of the lakes and mountains, and love for Nature was only slowly leading him to love and reverence for man. Nay, such attraction as he had hitherto felt for the human race had been interwoven with her influence in a way so strange that to many minds it will seem a childish fancy not worth recounting. The objects of his boyish idealization had been Cumbrian shepherds-a race whose personality seems to melt into Nature's-who are united as intimately with moor and mountain as the petrel with the sea.

"A rambling school-boy, thus I felt his presence in his own domain As of a lord and master—or a power, Or genius, under Nature, under God, Presiding; and severest solitude Had more commanding looks when he was there. When up the lonely brooks on rainy days Angling I went, or trod the trackless hills By mists bewildered, suddenly mine eyes Have glanced upon him distant a few steps, In size a giant, stalking through thick fog.

His sheep like Greenland bears; or, as he stepped Beyond the boundary line of some hill-shadow, His form hath flashed upon me, glorified By the deep radiance of the setting sun; Or him have I descried in distant sky, A solitary object and sublime, Above all height! like an aerial cross Stationed alone upon a spiry rock Of the Chartreuse, for worship. Thus was man Ennobled outwardly before my sight; And thus my heart was early introduced To an unconscious love and reverence Of human nature; hence the human form To me became an index of delight, Of grace and honour, power and worthiness."

"This sanctity of Nature given to man"—this interfusion of human interest with the sublimity of moor and hill—formed a typical introduction to the manner in which Wordsworth regarded mankind to the end—depicting him as set, as it were, amid impersonal influences, which make his passion and struggle but a little thing; as when painters give but a strip of their canvas to the fields and cities of men, and overhang the narrowed landscape with the space and serenity of heaven.

To this distant perception of man—of man "purified, removed, and to a distance that was fit"—was added, in his first summer vacation, a somewhat closer interest in the small joys and sorrows of the villagers of Hawkshead—a new sympathy for the old Dame in whose house the poet still lodged, for "the quiet woodman in the woods," and even for the "frank-hearted maids of rocky Cumberland," with whom he now delighted to spend an occasional evening in dancing and country mirth. And since the events in this poet's life are for the most part inward and unseen, and depend upon some shock and coincidence between the operations of his spirit and the cosmorama of the external world, he has recorded with especial emphasis a certain sunrise which met him as he walked homewards from one of these scenes of rustic gaiety—a sunrise which may be said to have begun that poetic career which a sunset was to close:

15

"Ah! need I say, dear Friend, that to the brim My heart was full; I made no vows, but vows Were then made for me; bond unknown to me Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly, A dedicated Spirit."

His second long vacation brought him a further gain in human affections. His sister, of whom he had seen little for some years, was with him once more at Penrith, and with her another maiden.

"By her exulting outside look of youth
And placid under-countenance, first endeared;"

whose presence now laid the foundation of a love which was to be renewed and perfected when his need for it was full, and was to be his support and solace to his life's end. His third long vacation he spent in a walking tour in Switzerland. Of this, now the commonest relaxation of studious youth, he speaks as of an "unprecedented course," indicating "a hardy slight of college studies and their set rewards." And it seems, indeed, probable that Wordsworth and his friend Jones were actually the first undergraduates who ever spent their summer in this way. The pages of the Prelude which narrate this excursion, and especially the description of the crossing of the Simplon—

"The immercurable height Of wood; decaying never to be decayed."

ne of the most impressive parts of that singular anaphical poem, which, at fir to icht so tedious and seems to gather force and meaning with each fresh.

There pages, which carry up to the verse of

There pares, which carry up to the verse of of the ctory of Word worth' career, contain, perserving and imple a picture as we chall anywhere hardy English youth its proud schi ufficingue is reless independence of all human thines. Excitend thought, and joy, seem to come at once at its and the chequered and trunching existence of en seems something which it need never enter, and deigns to comprehend.

laworth and his friend encountered on this tour astirring symbol of the expectancy that was runarough the nations of Europe. They basical at conthe very eye of that great federal day," when as of Liberty were planted all over France. They their return

"The Britaint again on the first For battle in the care of liberty."

he exulting pulse that run through the poet's veins arilly yet pause to eximpathics deeply conswith the world's life appealed most ducally to aribut

&quot;A stripling, careely of the how chold then
Of could life, I looked upon the orthogon
As from a defance; how disand have, and tolt
Was fouched, but with no intimate ordinar
I beeined to move along them have built
Moves through the anger of a first parameter

I wanted not that joy, I did not need Such help. The ever-living universe, Turn where I might, was opening out its glories; And the independent spirit of pure youth Called forth at every season new delights, Spread round my steps like sunshine o'er green fields."

CHAPTER II.

RESIDENCE IN LONDON AND IN FRANCE.

WORTH took his B.A. degree in January, 1791, and Cambridge with no fixed intentions as to his futer. "He did not feel himself," he said long afs, "good enough for the Church; he felt that his as not properly disciplined for that holy office, and struggle between his conscience and his impulses ave made life a torture. He also shrank from the Ie had studied military history with great interest, strategy of war; and he always fancied that he ents for command; and he at one time thought of ry life; but then he was without connexions, and if he were ordered to the West Indies his talents not save him from the yellow fever, and he gave ." He therefore repaired to London, and lived r a time on a small allowance, and with no definite His relations with the great city were of a very nd external kind. He had few acquaintances, and s time mainly in rambling about the streets. ions of this phase of his life have little interest. s some flatness in an enumeration of the nationaliervable in a London crowd, concluding thus—

"Malays, Lascars, the Tartar, the Chinese, And Negro Ladies in white muslin gowns." But Wordsworth's limitations were inseparably connected with his strength. And just as the flat scenery of Cambridgeshire had only served to intensify his love for such elements of beauty and grandeur as still were present in sky and fen, even so the bewilderment of London taught him to recognize with an intenser joy such fragments of things rustic, such aspects of things eternal, as were to be found amidst that rush and roar. To the frailer spirit of Hartley Coleridge the weight of London might seem a load impossible to shake off. "And what hath Nature," he plaintively asked—

"And what hath Nature but the blank void sky And the thronged river toiling to the main?"

But Wordsworth saw more than this. He became, as one may say, the poet not of London considered as London, but of London considered as a part of the country. Liko his own Farmer of Tilsbury Vale—

"In the throng of the Town like a Stranger is he, Like one whose own Country's far over the sea; And Nature, while through the great city he hies, Full ten times a day takes his heart by surprise."

Among the poems describing these sudden shocks of vision and memory none is more exquisite than the Reverie of Poor Susan:

"At the corner of Wood Street, when daylight appears,
Hangs a Thrush that sings loud, it has sung for three years;
Poor Susan has passed by the spot, and has heard
In the silence of morning the song of the Bird.

"'Tis a note of enchantment; what ails her? She sees A mountain ascending, a vision of trees; Bright volumes of vapour through Lothbury glide, And a river flows on through the vale of Cheapside." The picture is one of those which come home to many a country heart with one of those sudden "revulsions into the natural" which philosophers assert to be the essence of human joy. But noblest and best known of all these poems is the Sonnet on Westminster Bridge, "Earth hath not anything to show more fair;" in which Nature has reasserted her dominion over the works of all the multitude of men; and in the early clearness the poet behold, the great City—as Sterling imagined it on his dying bed—"not as full of noise and dust and confusion, but assomething silent, grand, and everlasting." And even in later life, when Wordsworth was often in London, and was welcome in any society, he never lost this external manner of regarding it. He was always of the same mind as the group of listeners in his Power of Music:

"Now, Coachest and Charioted roar on like a effecting Here are twenty Souls happy as souls in a dream: They are deaf to your murmure, they care not for you, Nor what ye are flying, nor what we pursue!"

He never made the attempt—vulgarized by so many a "fashionable novelist," and in which no poet has succeeded yet—to disentangle from that turmoil its elements of romance and of greatness; to enter that realm of emotion where Nature's aspects become the scarcely noted accessory of vicissitudes that transcend her own; to trace the passion or the anguish which whirl along some lurid vista towards a sun that sets in storm, or gaze across alent squares by summer moonlight amid a smell of dust and flowers.

But although Wordsworth passed thus through London unmodified and indifferent, the current of things was sweeping him on to mingle in a fiercer tunult sto be caught in the tides of a more violent and feverish life. In November, 1791, he landed in France, meaning to pass the winter at Orleans and learn French. Up to this date the French Revolution had impressed him in a rather unusual manner—namely, as being a matter of course. The explanation of this view is a somewhat singular one. Wordsworth's was an old family, and his connexions were some of them wealthy and well placed in the world; but the chances of his education had been such that he could scarcely realize to himself any other than a democratic type of society. Scarcely once, he tells us, in his school days had he seen boy or man who claimed respect on the score of wealth and blood; and the manly atmosphere of Cambridge preserved even in her lowest days a society

"Where all stood thus far Upon equal ground; that we were brothers all In honour, as in one community, Scholars and gentlemen;"

while the teachings of nature and the dignity of Cumbrian peasant life had confirmed his high opinion of the e-sential worth of man. The upheaval of the French people, therefore, and the downfall of privilege, seemed to him no portent for good or evil, but rather the tardy return of a society to its stable equilibrium. He passed through revolutionized Paris with satisfaction and sympathy, but with little active emotion, and proceeded first to Orleans, and then to Blois, between which places he spent nearly a year. At Orleans he became intimately acquainted with the noblyborn but republican General Beaupuis, an inspiring example of all in the Revolution that was self-devoted and chivalrous, and had compassion on the wretched poor. In conversation with him Wordsworth learnt with what new force ell-worn adages of the morali 4 fall from the lips of ho is called upon to put them at once in action, and the life itself on the verify of his maxims of honour, soct's heart burned within him as he listened. He not, indeed, help mourning cometimes at the liefs of mantled chapel, or peopling in imagination she fore its in which they sat with the chivalry of action one. But he became increasingly absorbed in his framely, and the Revolution munifor formous styres and to him big with all the hopes of man.

returned to Paris in October, 1792 a month after assacres of September; and he has described he as i and dismay at the sight of such world wide de di wayed by the hands of such men. In a particle which isly illustrates that reasoned celf-confidence and deto holdness which for the most part he chosed only e peaceful incidents of a literary career, is her sold whe was on the point of putting himself torsand as ler of the Girondist party, in the conviction that to -heartedness of aim would make him, in spite of teresconand imperfect speech, a point round which the coninstincts of the multitude might not impossibly rativ. thin course of action which, whatever it seller is would undoubtedly have conducted him to the world with his political friends in May, 1793 And ten impossible by a somewhat undignified basis as e. Isworth, while in his own eyes "a patriot of the " was in the eyes of others a young man of two high ravelling on a small allowance, and runners he head innecessary dangers. His funds were stopped, and uctantly returned to England at the close of 112% d now to Wordsworth, as to many other English its, there came, on a great scale, that form of sources which in private life is one of the most agonizing of all—when two beloved beings, each of them erring greatly, become involved in bitter hate. The new-born Republic flung down to Europe as her battle-gage the head of a king. England, in an hour of horror that was almost panic, accepted the defiance, and war was declared hetween the two countries early in 1793. "No shock," says Wordsworth,

"Given to my moral nature had I known Down to that very moment; neither lapse Nor turn of sentiment that might be named A revolution, save at this one time;"

and the sound of the evening gun-fire at Portsmonth seemed at once the embodiment and the premonition of England's guilt and woe.

Yet his distracted spirit could find no comfort in the thought of France. For in France the worst came to the worst; and everything vanished of liberty except the crimes committed in her name.

"Most melancholy at that time, O Friend!

Were my day-thoughts, my nights were miscrable.

Through months, through years, long after the last heat
Of those atrocities, the hour of sleep
To me came rarely charged with natural gifts.

Such ghastly visions had I of despair,
And tyranny, and implements of death; . . .

And levity in dangeons, where the dust
Was laid with tears. Then suddenly the scene
Changed, and the unbroken dream entangled me
In long orations, which I strove to plead
Before unjust tribunals—with a voice
Labouring, a brain confounded, and a sense,
Death-like, of treacherous desertion, felt
In the last place of refuge—my own soul," e years of perplexity and disappointment, followa season of overstrained and violent hopes, were rpest trial through which Wordsworth ever passed. urse of affairs in France, indeed, was such as seeman irony of fate to drive the noblest and firmest into the worst aberrations. For first of all in that tion, Reason had appeared, as it were, in visible and hand in hand with Pity and Virtue; then, as fare of the oppressed peasantry began to be lost f amid the brawls of the factions of Paris, all that tractive and enthusiastic in the great movement to disappear, but yet Reason might still be thought a closer realization here than among scenes more and fair; and, lastly, Reason set in blood and tyranthere was no more hope from France. But those ce Wordsworth, had been taught by that great conto disdain the fetters of sentiment and tradition, look on Reason as supreme, were not willing to retheir belief because violence had conquered her in re battle. Rather they clung with the greater te--" adhered," in Wordsworth's words,

"More firmly to old tenets, and to prove Their temper, strained them more;"

more decisively than ever the influences of tradid in their Utopian visions even wished to see the ed race severed in its perfection from the memories anity, and from kinship with the struggling past. ugh a mood of this kind Wordsworth had to travel And his nature, formed for pervading attachments ady memories, suffered grievously from the privamuch which even the coldest and calmest temper forego without detriment and pain. For it is not with impunity that men commit themselves to the sole guidance of either of the two great elements of their being. The penalties of trusting to the emotion alone are notorious; and every day affords some in tance of a character that has degenerated into a bundle of impulses, of a will that has become caprice. But the coarse penalty and our tyrant instead of our king are almost equally disastrous. There is so little which Rea on, divested of all emotional or instinctive supports, is able to prove to our satisfaction that a sceptical aridity is likely to take possession of the soul. It was thus with Wordsworth; he was driven to a perpetual questioning of all beliefs and analysis of all motives—

"Till, demanding formal proof,
And seeking it in everything, I lost
All feeling of conviction; and, in fine,
Sick, wearied out with contraricties,
Yielded up moral que tions in despair."

In this mood all those great generalized conceptions which are the food of our love, our reverence, our religion, dissolve away; and Wordsworth tells us that at this time

"Even the visible univer a FeII under the dominion of a taste Less spiritual, with microscopic view Was scanned, as I had scanned the moral world."

He looked on the operations of nature "in disconnection dull and spiritless;" he could no longer apprehend her unity nor feel her charm. He retained, indeed, his craving for natural beauty, but in an uneasy and fastidious mood.

"Giving way To a comparison of scene with scene, Bent overmuch on superficial things, Pampering myself with meagre novelties Of colour and proportion; to the moods Of time and season, to the moral power, The affections, and the spirit of the place, Insensible."

th cold fits are common to all religions; they haunt rtist, the philanthropist, the philosopher, the saint. they are due to some strain of egoism or ambition has intermixed itself with the impersonal desire; imes, as in Wordsworth's case, to the persistent tenof a mind which has been bent too ardently towards eal scarce possible to man. And in this case, when bjects of a man's habitual admiration are true and they will ever be found to suggest some antidote e fatigues of their pursuit. We shall see as we prohow a deepening insight into the lives of the peasaround him - the happiness and virtue of simple rian homes—restored to the poet a serener confiin human nature, amid all the shame and downfall ch hopes in France. And that still profounder loss light in Nature herself-that viewing of all things isconnection dull and spiritless," which, as it has been aid, is the truest definition of Atheism, inasmuch as a in the universe is the first element in our conception d-this dark pathway also was not without its outlet he day. For the God in Nature is not only a God auty, but a God of Law; his unity can be apprehendpower as well as in glory; and Wordsworth's mind, ing inward upon itself from thought to thought," rest for the time in that austere religion-Hebrew ce and scientific, common to a Newton and a Jobis fostered by the prolonged contemplation of the Order of the sum of things.

"Not in vain I had been taught to reverence a Power That is the visible quality and shape And image of right reason."

Not, indeed, in vain! For he felt now that there is no side of truth, however remote from human interests, no aspect of the universe, however awful and impersonal, which may not have power at some season to guide and support the spirit of man. When Goodness is obscured, when Beauty wearies, there are some souls which still can cling and grapple to the conception of eternal Law.

Of such stern consolations the poet speaks as having restored him in his hour of need. But he gratefully acknowledges also another solace of a gentler kind. It was about this time (1795) that Wordsworth was blessed with the permanent companionship of his sister, to whom he was tenderly attached, but whom, since childhood, he had seen only at long intervals. Miss Wordsworth, after her father's death, had lived mainly with her maternal grandfather, Mr. Cookson, at Penrith; occasionally at Halifax with other relations; or at Forncett with her uncle, Dr. Cookson, Canon of Windsor. She was now able to join her favourite brother; and in this gifted woman Wordsworth found a gentler and sunnier likeness of himself; he found a love which never wearied, and a sympathy fervid without blindness, whose suggestions lay so directly in his mind's natural course that they seemed to spring from the same individuality, and to form at once a portion of his inmost being. The opening of this new era of domestic happiness demands a separate chapter.

CHAPTER III.

MISS WORDSWORTH.—LYRICAL BALLADS.—SETTLEMENT AT GRASMERE.

FROM among many letters of Miss Wordsworth's to a beloved friend (Miss Jane Pollard, afterwards Mrs. Marshall, of Hallsteads), which have been kindly placed at my disposal, I may without impropriety quote a few passages which illustrate the character and the affection of brother and sister alike. And first, in a letter (Forncett, February, 1792), comparing her brothers Christopher and William, she says: "Christopher is steady and sincere in his attachments. William has both these virtues in an eminent degree, and a sort of violence of affection, if I may so term it, which demonstrates itself every moment of the day, when the objects of his affection are present with him, in a thousand almost imperceptible attentions to their wishes, in a sort of restless watchfulness which I know not how to describe, a tenderness that never sleeps, and at the same time such a delicacy of manner as I have observed in few men." And again (Forncett, June, 1793), she writes to the same friend: "I have strolled into a neighbouring meadow, where I am enjoying the melody of birds, and the busy sounds of a fine summer's evening. But oh! how imperfect is my pleasure whilst I am alone! Why are you not seated with me? and my dear William,

why is he not here also? I could almost fancy that I see you both near me. I hear you point out a spot, where, if we could erect a little cottage and call it our own, we should be the happiest of human beings. I see my brother fired with the idea of leading his sister to such a retreat. Our parlour is in a moment furnished, our garden is adorned by magic; the roses and honeysuckles spring at our command; the wood behind the house lifts its head, and furnishes us with a winter's shelter and a summer's noonday shade. My dear friend, I trust that erclong you will be, without the aid of imagination, the companion of my walks, and my dear William may be of our party.... He is now going upon a tour in the west of England, with a gentleman who was formerly a school-fellow-a man of fortune, who is to bear all the expenses of the journey, and only requests the favour of William's company. He is perfectly at liberty to quit this companion as soon as anything more advantageous offers. But it is enough to say that I am likely to have the happiness of introducing you to my beloved brother. You must forgive me for talking so much of him; my affection hurries me on, and makes me forget that you cannot be so much interested in the subject as I am. You do not know him; you do not know how amiable he is. Perhaps you reply, 'But I know how blinded you are.' Well, my dearest, I plead guilty at once; I must be blind; he cannot be so pleasing as my fondness makes him. I am willing to allow that half the virtues with which I fancy him endowed are the creation of my love; but surely I may be excused! He was never tired of comforting his sister; he never left her in anger; he always met her with joy; he preferred her society to every other pleasure—or rather, when we were so happy as to be within each other's reach, he had no pleasure when we were compelled to be divided. Do not, then, expect too much from this brother of whom I have delighted so to talk to you. In the first place, you must be with him more than once before he will be perfectly easy in conversation. In the second place, his person is not in his favour—at least I should think not; but I soon ceased to discover this—nay, I almost thought that the opinion which I had formed was erroneous. He is, however, certainly rather plain, though otherwise has an extremely thoughtful countenance; but when he speaka it is often lighted up by a smile which I think very pleasing. But enough, he is my brother; why should I describe him? I shall be launching again into panegyric."

The brother's language to his sister is equally affectionate. "How much do I wish," he writes in 1793, "that each emotion of pleasure or pain that visits your heart should excite a similar pleasure or a similar pain within me, by that sympathy which will almost identify us when we have stolen to our little cottage. . . . I will write to my uncle, and tell him that I cannot think of going anywhere before I have been with you. Whatever answer he gives me, I certainly will make a point of once more mingling my transports with yours. Alas! my dear sister, how soon must this happiness expire; yet there are moments worth ages."

And again, in the same year, he writes, "Oh, my dear, dear sister! with what transport shall I again meet you! with what rapture shall I again wear out the day in your sight!... I see you in a moment running, or rather flying, to my arms."

Wordsworth was in all things fortunate, but in nothing more fortunate than in this, that so unique a companion should have been ready to devote herself to him with an affection wholly free from egoism or jealousy-an affection that yearned only to satisfy his subtlest needs, and to transfuse all that was best in herself into his larger being. And, indeed, that fortunate admixture or influence, whencesoever derived, which raised the race of Wordsworth to poetic fame, was almost more dominant and conspicuous in Dorothy Wordsworth than in the poet himself. shooting lights of her wild eyes" reflected to the full the strain of imaginative emotion which was mingled in the poet's nature with that spirit of steadfast and conservative virtue which has already given to the family a Master of Trinity, two Bishops, and other divines and scholars of weight and consideration. In the poet himself the conservative and ecclesiastical tendencies of his character became more and more apparent as advancing years stiffened the movements of the mind. In his sister the ardent element was less restrained; it showed itself in a most innocent direction, but it brought with it a heavy punishment. Her passion for nature and her affection for her brother led her into mountain rambles which were beyond her strength, and her last years were spent in a condition of physical and mental decay.

But at the time of which we are now speaking there was, perhaps, no one in the world who could have been to the poet such a companion as his sister became. She had not, of course, his grasp of mind or his poetic power; but her sensitiveness to nature was quite as keen as his, and her disposition resembled his "with sunshine added to daylight."

&quot;Birds in the bower, and lambs in the green field, Could they have known her, would have loved; methought Her very presence such a sweetness breathed, That flowers, and trees, and even the silent hills,

And everything she looked on, should have had An intimation how she bore herself Towards them, and to all creatures."

ournal of a tour in Scotland, and her description ek on Ullswater, affixed to Wordsworth's Guide to es—diaries not written for publication, but merely nunicate her own delight to intimate friends at a -are surely indescribably attractive in their naive der feeling, combined with a delicacy of insight iral beauty which was almost a new thing in the of the world. If we compare, for instance, any of riptions of the Lakes with Southey's, we see the e between mere literary skill, which can now be n many quarters, and that sympathetic intuition mes of love alone. Even if we compare her with ose short notice of Cumberland bears on every stamp of a true poet, we are struck by the way n Miss Wordsworth's tenderness for all living ives character and pathos to her landscapes, and om the wildest solitude some note that thrills the

"She gave me eyes, she gave me ears,
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart the fountain of sweet tears;
And love, and thought, and joy."

ottage life in her brother's company, which we Miss Wordsworth picturing to herself with girler, was destined to be realized no long time afthanks to the unlooked-for outcome of another of the poet's sister was his first admirer, Raisert may fairly claim the second place. Calvert on of the steward of the Duke of Norfolk, who large estates in Cumberland. He attached him-were much together. Calvert was then attache sumption, and Wordsworth nursed him with part was found at his death that he had left in legacy of 900%. "The act," says Wordsworth, entirely from a confidence on his part that I h and attainments which might be of use to marking the interest of the 900%—400% being laid out it—with 200% deducted from the principal, and I acy to my sister, and 100% more which the Za lads have brought me, my sister and I contrive

Trusting in this small capital, and with nothin to in the future except the uncertain prospect of seven years, nearly eight."

self to Wordsworth, and in 1793 and 1794 T

ment of Lord Lonsdale's debt to the family, W settled with his sister at Racedown, near Cree Dorsetshire, in the autumn of 1795, the choice cality being apparently determined by the offer tage on easy terms. Here, in the first home had possessed, Wordsworth's steady devotion began. He had already, in 1792, published poems, the Evening Walk and Descriptive SE-to Miss Wordsworth (to whom the Evening Walk dressed) criticises with candour in a letter to friend (Forncett, February, 1792):

a poet's eye, and are portrayed with a poet's partie poems contain many passages expail it? but they also contain many faults, the chief of obscurity and a too frequent use of some part pressions and uncommon words; for instance,

"The scenes which he describes have been vis

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Menoirs say in 1793, but the following MS let speaks of them as already published.

which he applies in a sense, if not new, at least different from its ordinary one. By 'moveless,' when applied to the swan, he means that sort of motion which is smooth without agitation; it is a very beautiful epithet, but ought to have been cautiously used. The word riewless also is introduced far too often. I regret exceedingly that he did not submit the works to the inspection of some friend before their publication, and he also joins with me in this regret."

These poems show a careful and minute observation of nature, but their versification—still reminding us of the imitators of Pope - has little originality or charm. They attracted the admiration of Coleridge, but had no further success.

At Racedown Wordsworth finished Guilt and Sorrow, a poem gloomy in tone and written mainly in his period of depretion and unrest; and wrote a tragedy called The Borderers, of which only a few lines show any promise of future excellence. He then wrote The Rained Cottage, now incorporated in the First Book of the Excursion. This poem, on a subject thoroughly suited to his powers, was his first work of merit; and Coleridge, who visited the quiet household in June, 1797, pronounces this poem "apperior, I hesitate not to aver, to anything in our language which in any way resembles it." In July, 1797, the Wordsworths removed to Alfoyden, a large house in Somersetshire, near Netherstowey, where Coleridge was at that time living. Here Word worth added to his income by taking as pupil a young boy, the hero of the trifling poem Anecdote for Eathers, a son of Mr. Basil Montagn; and here he composed many of his smaller pieces. He has described the origin of the Ancient Maximer and the Lyrical Ballads in a well known passage, part of which I must here repeat:

"In the autumn of 1797, Mr. Colerate, my a ter, and intent started from Alfoxden pretty late in the afternoon, with a view to visit binton, and the Valley of Stone mear to it; and as our quited funds were very small, we agreed to defray the expense of the tour by writing a poem, to be sent to the New Monthly Magazine. In the course of this walk was planned the posts of the Artes Marrier, founded on a dream, as Mr. Colerid would, of his triend Mr. Circle shank. Much the greatest part of the story was Mr. Colors by in vention; but certain parts I suggested; for example, some came was to be committed which was to bring upon the Old Navicut at at a Coloridge afterwards delighted to call him, the spectral persecution, as a consequence of that crime and his own watelerings. I had been reading in Shelvocke's Voyages, a day or two before, that while doubling Cape Horn they frequently saw albatro-ses in that latitude, the largest sort of sea fowl, some extending their waters twelve or thirteen feet. 'Suppose,' said I, 'von represent him as havin - kill ed one of these birds on entering the South Soa, and that the totelary spirits of these regions take upon them to average the come. The incident was thought fit for the purpose, and adopted according ly. I also suggested the navigation of the ship by the dead man, but do not recollect that I had anything more to do with the scheme of the poem. We began the composition forether, on that to me memorable evening. I furnished two or three has at the becommenof the poem, in particular ---

"And listened like a three year? child;
The Mariner had his will,"

As we endeavoured to proceed conjointly our respective manners proved so widely different, that it would have been quite presumptuous in me to do anything but separate from an undeathing upon which I could only have been a clog. The Ancient Marrier grow and grew, till it became too important for our first object, which was him ited to our expectation of five pounds; and we began to think of a volume, which was to consist, as Mr. Coleridge has told the world, of poems chiefly on supernatural subjects, taken from common life, but looked at, as much as might be, through an imaginative medium."

The volume of Lyrical Ballads, whose first beginnings have here been traced, was published in the autumn of 1798, by Mr. Cottle, at Bridol. This volume contained several poems which have been justly blamed for triviality . n. The Thorn, Goody Bloke, The Lifet Boy; several in which, as in Somon Loc, triviality is minored with much real purhous and some, as Expositifation and Reply and The Tables Trained, which are of the very escence of Word worth's minre. It is leadly too much to say that, if the etwo lat upped poem to the errele seve so slight and triffing were all that had remained from Wordsworth's hand, they would have "spoken to the comprehending" of a new individuality, as distinct and unmistakable in it, way as that which Supplied has left engraven on the world forever in word, even fewer than these. And the volume ended with a poem which Wordsworth composed in 170% in one day, during a tour with his sister to Tintern and Chep tow. The Lines written above Tintern Africa I have become, as it were, the locus classic ers, or consecrated formulary of the Wordsworthian faith. They by in brief what it is the work of the poet's biog rapher to av in detail.

As own is this volume was published Word worth and his sister sailed for Hamburs, in the hope that their imperfect acquaintance with the German language might be improved by the heroic remedy of a winter at Go lar. But at Go lar they do not seem to have made any acquaintances, and their silf improvement consisted mainly in reading German books to them cives. The four months spent at Go lar, however, were the very bloom of Wordsworth's poetic curver. Through none of his poems has the peculiar toyeliness of Enotich seenery and Enotich girthood shone more delicately than through those which came to him as the precidency than through those which came to him as the precidency from scardens of that de olate city. Here it was that he wrote Lacy Gray, and Kuth, and Nutling, and the Poet's Epitaph, and other poems known now to most men as possessing in its full fragrance his especial charm. And here it was that the memory of some emotion prompted the lines on Lucy. Of the history of that emotion he has told us nothing; I forbear, therefore, to inquire concerning it, or even to speculate. That it was to the poet's honour, I do not doubt; but who ever learned such secrets rightly? or who should with to learn? It is best to leave the sanctuary of all hearts inviolate, and to respect the reserve not only of the living but of the dead. Of these poems, almost alone, Wordsworth in his autobiographical notes has said nothing whatever. One of them he suppressed for years, and printed only in a later volume. One can, indeed, well imagine that there may be posmis which a man may be willing to give to the world only in the hope that their pathos will be, as it were, protected by its own intensity, and that those who are worthick to comprehend will be least disposed to discuss them.

The autobiographical notes on his own works above alluded to were dictated by the poet to his friend Miss. Is a bella Fenwick, at her urgent request, in 1840, and preserve many interesting particulars as to the circumstances under which each poem was composed. They are to be found printed entire among Wordsworth's press works, and I shall therefore cite them only occasionally. Of Lacy Gray, for instance, he says—

"It was founded on a circumstance told me by my sister, of a little girl who, not far from Halifax, in Yorkshire, was bewildered in a snow-storm. Her footsteps were tracked by her parents to the middle of the lock of a canal, and no other vestige of her, backward or forward, could be traced. The body, however, was found in the canal. The way in which the incident was treated, and the apiritualizing of the character, might furnish hints for contrasting the imaginative influences which I have endeavoured to throw over common life, with Crabbe's matter-of-fact style of handling subjects of the same kind."

And of the Lines written in Germany, 1798-99-

"A bitter winter it was when these verses were composed by the side of my sister, in our lodgings, at a draper's house, in the romantic imperial town of Goslar, on the edge of the Hartz forest. So severe was the cold of this winter that, when we passed out of the parlour warmed by the stove, our cheeks were struck by the air as by cold iron. I slept in a room over a passage that was not ceiled. The people of the house used to say, rather unfeelingly, that they expected I should be frozen to death some night; but with the protection of a pelisse lined with fur, and a dog's-skin bonnet, such as was worn by the peasants, I walked daily on the ramparts or on a sort of public ground or garden, in which was a pond. Here I had no companion but a kingfisher, a beautiful creature that used to glance by me. I consequently became much attached to it. During these walks I composed The Poet's Epitaph."

Seldom has there been a more impressive instance of the contrast, familiar to biographers, between the apparent insignificance and the real importance of their hero in undistinguished youth. To any one considering Wordsworth as he then was-a rough and somewhat stubborn young man, who, in nearly thirty years of life, had seemed alternately to idle without grace and to study without advantage - it might well have seemed incredible that he could have anything new or valuable to communicate to mankind. Where had been his experience? or where was the indication of that wealth of sensuous emotion which in such a nature as Keats's seems almost to dispense with experience, and to give novelty by giving vividness to such passions as are known to all? If Wordsworth were to impress mankind it must be, one might have thought, by travelling out of himself altogether-by revealing some

and the Poet's Epitaph, and other poems known now to most men as possessing in its full fragrance his especial charm. And here it was that the memory of some emotion prompted the lines on Lucy. Of the history of that emotion he has told us nothing; I forbear, therefore to inquire concerning it, or even to speculate. That it was to the poet's honour, I do not doubt; but who ever learned such secrets rightly? or who should wish to learn! It is best to leave the sanctuary of all hearts inviolate, and to respect the reserve not only of the living but of the dead. Of these poems, almost alone, Wordsworth in his autobiographical notes has said nothing whatever. One of them he suppressed for years, and printed only in a later volume. One can, indeed, well imagine that there may be pooms which a man may be willing to give to the world only in the hope that their pathos will be, as it were, protected by its own intensity, and that those who are worthiest to comprehend will be least disposed to discuss them.

The autobiographical notes on his own works above alluded to were dictated by the poet to his friend Miss Isabella Fenwick, at her urgent request, in 1843, and preserve many interesting particulars as to the circumstances under which each poem was composed. They are to be found printed entire among Wordsworth's prese works, and I shall therefore cite them only occasionally. Of Lucy Gray, for instance, he says—

"It was founded on a circumstance told me by my sister, of a little girl who, not far from Halifax, in Yorkshire, was bewildered in a snow-storm. Her footsteps were tracked by her parents to the unidle of the lock of a canal, and no other vestige of her, backward or forward, could be traced. The body, however, was found in the canal. The way in which the incident was treated, and the spiritualising of the character, might furnish hints for contrasting the imaginative ces which I have endeavoured to throw over common life, with respect to the same kind."

d of the Lines written in Germany, 1798-99-

bitter winter it was when these verses were composed by the my sister, in our lodgings, at a draper's house, in the romantic at town of Goslar, on the edge of the Hartz forest. So severe cold of this winter that, when we passed out of the parlour by the stove, our cheeks were struck by the air as by cold slept in a room over a passage that was not ceiled. The of the house used to say, rather unfeelingly, that they expectional be frozen to death some night; but with the protection disse lined with fur, and a dog's-skin bonnet, such as was worn peasants, I walked daily on the ramparts or on a sort of public or garden, in which was a pond. Here I had no companda kingfisher, a beautiful creature that used to glance by meaning the Poet's Epitaph."

10m has there been a more impressive instance of the st, familiar to biographers, between the apparent incance and the real importance of their hero in undisshed youth. To any one considering Wordsworth then was—a rough and somewhat stubborn young vho, in nearly thirty years of life, had seemed alterto idle without grace and to study without ade - it might well have seemed incredible that he have anything new or valuable to communicate to nd. Where had been his experience? or where was lication of that wealth of sensuous emotion which in nature as Keats's seems almost to dispense with exce, and to give novelty by giving vividness to such as as are known to all? If Wordsworth were to immankind it must be, one might have thought, by ing out of himself altogether-by revealing some such energy of imagination as can create a work mance and adventure in the shyest heart. But t not so to be. Already Wordsworth's minor poet dealt almost entirely with his own feelings, and w objects actually before his eyes; and it was at Good he planned, and on the day of his quitting Goslar began, a much longer poem, whose subject was to more intimately personal, being the development of I mind. This poem, dedicated to Coleridge, and wri the form of a confidence bestowed on an intimate was finished in 1805, but was not published till af poet's death. Mrs. Wordsworth then named it 77 lude, indicating thus the relation which it bears to t cursion-or, rather, to the projected poem of the I of which the Excursion was to form only the Seco of three Divisions. One Book of the First Division Recluse was written, but is yet unpublished; the Division was never even begun, and "the materia are told, "of which it would have been formed hav incorporated, for the most part, in the author's other lications." Nor need this change of plan be regdidactic poems admit easily of mutilation; and all th be called plot in this series of works is contained Prelude, in which we see Wordsworth arriving at convictions which in the Excursion he pairses to exp

It would be too much to say that Wordsworth has wholly successful in the attempt—for such the I virtually is—to write an epic poem on his own edu Such a poem must almost necessarily appear tedio egoistic, and Wordsworth's manner has not tact at to prevent these defects from being felt to the ful the contrary, in his constant desire frugally to extrict were, its full teaching from the minutest event has befallen him, he supplements the self-complacency of the autobiographer with the conscientious exactness of the moralist, and is apt to insist on trifles such as lodge in the corners of every man's memory, as if they were unique lessons vouchsafed to himself alone.

Yet it follows from this very temper of mind that there is scarcely any autobiography which we can read with such implicit confidence as the Prelude. In the case of this, as of so many of Wordsworth's productions, our first dissatisfaction at the form which the poem assumes yields to a recognition of its fitness to express precisely what the poet Nor are there many men who, in recounting the story of their own lives, could combine a candour so absolute with so much of dignity; who could treat their personal history so impartially as a means of conveying lessons of general truth; or who, while chronicling such small things, could remain so great. The Prelude is a book of good augury for human nature. We feel in reading it as if the stock of mankind were sound. The soul seems going on from strength to strength by the mere development of her inborn power. And the scene with which the poem at once opens and concludes—the return to the Lake country as to a permanent and satisfying home - places the poet at last amid his true surroundings, and leaves us to contemplate him as completed by a harmony without him, which he of all men most needed to evoke the harmony within.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ENGLISH LAKES.

THE lakes and mountains of Cumberland, Westmon and Lancashire are singularly fitted to supply sue ments of moral sustenance as nature's aspects can There are, indeed, many mountain regis greater awfulness; but prospects of ice and terror : be a rare stimulant rather than an habitual food; as physical difficulties inseparable from immense elev depress the inhabitant and preoccupy the traveller. are many lakes under a more lustrous sky; but the h activities of life demand a scene brilliant without la and a beauty which can refresh and satisfy rather th or overpower. Without advancing any untenable to British pre-eminence in the matter of scenery, we perhaps, follow on both these points the judgment Wordsworth has expressed in his Guide to the La work which condenses the results of many years of mate observation.

"Our tracts of wood and water," he says, "are a diminutive in comparison (with Switzerland); then as far as sublimity is dependent upon absolute but height, and atmospherical influences in connexion these, it is obvious that there can be no rivalship, a short residence among the British mountains with nish abundant proof that, after a certain point of elevation, viz., that which allows of compact and fleecy clouds settling upon, or sweeping over, the summits, the sense of sublimity depends more upon form and relation of objects to each other than upon their actual magnitude; and that an elevation of 3000 feet is sufficient to call forth in a most impressive degree the creative, and magnifying, and softening powers of the atmosphere."

And again, as to climate: "The rain," he says, "here comes down heartily, and is frequently succeeded by clear bright weather, when every brook is vocal, and every torrent sonorous; brooks and torrents which are never muddy even in the heaviest floods. Days of unsettled weather, with partial showers, are very frequent; but the showers, darkening or brightening as they fly from hill to hill, are not less grateful to the eye than finely interwoven passages of gay and sad music are touching to the ear. Vapours exhaling from the lakes and meadows after sunrise in a hot season, or in moist weather brooding upon the heights, or descending towards the valleys with inaudible motion, give a visionary character to everything around them; and are in themselves so beautiful as to dispose us to enter into the feelings of those simple nations (such as the Laplanders of this day) by whom they are taken for guardian deities of the mountains; or to sympathize with others who have fancied these delicate apparitions to be the spirits of their departed ancestors. Akin to these are fleecy clouds resting upon the hill-tops; they are not easily managed in picture, with their accompaniments of blue sky, but how glorious are they in nature! how pregnant with imagination for the poet! And the height of the Cumbrian mountains is sufficient to exhibit daily and hourly instances of those mysterious attachments.

Such clouds, cleaving to their stations, or lifting up suddenly their glittering heads from behind rocky barriers, or hurrying out of sight with speed of the sharpest edge, will often tempt an inhabitant to congratulate himself on belonging to a country of mists and clouds and storms, and make him think of the blank sky of Egypt, and of the cerulean vacancy of Italy, as an unanimated and even a sad spectacle."

The consciousness of a preceding turmoil brings home to us best the sense of perfect peace; and a climate accustomed to storm-cloud and tempest can melt sometimes into "a day as still as heaven," with a benignant tranquillity which calmer regions can scarcely know. Such a day Wordsworth has described in language of such delicate truth and beauty as only a long and intimate love can inspire:

"It has been said that in human life there are moments worth ages. In a more subdued tone of sympathy may we affirm, that in the climate of England there are, for the lover of nature, days which are worth whole months, I might say, even years. One of these favoured days sometimes occurs in spring time, when that soft air is breathing over the blossoms and new-born verdure which inspired Buchanan with his beautiful Ode to the First of May; the air which, in the luxuriance of his fancy, he likens to that of the golden age to that which gives motion to the funereal cypresses on the banks of Lethe; to the air which is to salute beatified spirits when expiatory fires shall have consumed the earth with all her habitations, is in autumn that days of such affecting influence most frequently in-The atmosphere seems refined, and the sky rendered more crystalline, as the vivifying heat of the year abates; the lights and shadows are more delicate; the colouring is richer and more finely harmonized; and, in this season of stillness, the ear being unoccu pied, or only gently excited, the sense of vision becomes more susceptible of its appropriate enjoyments. A resident in a country like this which we are treating of will agree with me that the presence of a lake is indispensable to exhibit in perfection the beauty of one of these days; and he must have experienced, while looking on the uncutted waters, that the imagination by their aid is carried into recessen of feeling otherwise impenetrable. The reason of this is, that the heavens are not only brought down into the bosom of the earth, but that the earth is mainly looked at, and thought of, through the me dium of a purer element. The happiest time is when the coninoctial gales are departed; but their fury may probably be called to mind by the sight of a few shattered boughs, whose leaves do not differ in colour from the faded foliage of the stately oaks from which these relies of the storm depend; all else speaks of tranquillity; not a breath of air, no reallessness of insects, and not a moving object percentible "except the clouds gliding in the depths of the lake, or the traveller making along, an inverted image, whose motion seems governed by the quiet of a time to which its archetype, the living person, is perhaps insensible; or it may happen that the figure of one of the larger birds, a raven or a heron, is crossing silently among the reflected clouds, while the voice of the real bird, from the element aloft, gently awakens in the spectator the recollection of appetites and instincts, pursuits and occupations, that deform and agitate the world, yet have no power to prevent nature from putting on an aspoet expable of satisfying the most intense cravings for the tranquil, the levely, and the perfect, to which man, the noblest of her creatures, is subject."

The scene described here is one as exquisite in detail as majestic in general effect. And it is characteristic of the region to which Wordsworth's love was given that there is no corner of it without a meaning and a charm; that the open record of its immemorial past tells us at every turn that all agencies have conclired for loveliness and ruin itself has been benign. A passage of Wordsworth's describing the character of the lake shores illustrates this fact with loving minuteness:

"Sublimity is the result of nature's first great dealings with the superficies of the Earth; but the general tendency of her subsequent operations is towards the production of beauty, by a multiplicity of symmetrical parts uniting in a consistent whole. This is ever exemplified along the margins of these lakes. Masses of rehave been precipitated from the heights into the area of w in some places like stranded ships, or have acquired the structure of jutting piers, or project in little penneulas ere . native wood. The smallest rivulet, one whose silent influx is ly noticeable in a season of dry weather, so faint is the dimi by it on the surface of the smooth lake, will be found to he not useless in shaping by its deposits of gravel and soil in flood, a curve that would not otherwise have existed. But t powerful brooks, encroaching upon the level of the lake, course of time, given birth to ample promontories of sweep line, that contrast boldly with the longitudinal base of the mi the opposite shore; while their flat or gently doping surface fail to introduce, into the midst of desolation and barrenness ements of fertility, even where the habitations of men may r been raised,"

With this we may contrast, as a companion pictar poet's description of the tarns, or lonely bodies of which lie here and there among the hills:

"They are difficult of access and naked; yet some of then their permanent forms, very grand, and there are accidents of which would make the meanest of them interesting. At all one of these pools is an acceptable sight to the mountain wa not morely as an incident that diversifies the prespect, but a ing in his mind a centre or complements point to which objects wise disconnected or insubordinated, may be referred. So have a varied outline, with bold heath-clad promontories; they mostly lie at the foot of a steep precipice, the water, wh sun is not shining upon it, appears black and sullen, and rot margin huge stones and masses of rock are scattered, some conjecture as to the means by which they came thither, and obviously fallen from on high, the contribution of ages. A pleasing sadness is induced by this perplexity and these imdecay; while the prospect of a body of pure water, quattends groves and other cheerful rural images by which fresh water ally accompanied, and unable to give furtherance to the mean n around it, excites a sense of some repulsive power strongly rth, and thus deepens the melancholy natural to such scenes."

those who love to deduce the character of a popufrom the character of their race and surroundings easantry of Cumberland and Westmoreland form an ctive theme. Drawn in great part from the strong linavian stock, they dwell in a land solemn and tiful as Norway itself, but without Norway's rigour penury, and with still lakes and happy rivers instead orway's inarming melancholy sea. They are a mounfolk; but their mountains are no precipices of insule snow, such as keep the dwellers in some Swiss et shut in ignorance and stagnating into idiocy. e barriers divide only to concentrate, and environ to endear; their guardianship is but enough to give lded unity to each group of kindred homes. And it is that the Cumbrian dalesmen have afforded ps as near a realization as human fates have yet ed of the rural society which statesmen desire for country's greatness. They have given an example bstantial comfort strenuously won; of home affecintensified by independent strength; of isolation ut ignorance, and of a shrewd simplicity; of an itary virtue which needs no support from fanaticism. which honour is more than law.

e school of political economists, moreover, who urge dvantage of a peasant proprietary, of small indent holdings—as at once drawing from the land the produce and rearing upon it the most vigorous rovident population—this school, as is well known, in the statesmen of Cumberland one of its favourite ples. In the days of border-wars, when the first object was to secure the existence of an many arms as possible, in readiness to repel the Sect, the aldo great proprietors in the north readily granted small on military tenure, which tenure, when personal in the field was no longer needed, became in most an absolute ownership. The attachment of these men to their hereditary estates, the heroic efforts they would make to avoid parting with them, for impressive phenomenon in the little world—a wonce of equality and of conservatism—swhich we seeme of Wordsworth's childish years, and which re his manhood's ideal.

The growth of large fortunes in England, and creased competition for land, has swallowed up a these small independent holdings in the extensive erties of wealthy men. And at the same time the of education, and the improved poor has a not off islation, by raising the condition of other parts of land, have tended to obliterate the contrast which marked in Wordsworth's day. How marked the trast was, a compari on of Cralde's poems with worth's will sufficiently indicate. Both are true pobut while in the one we see poverty as something and degrading, and the Tules of the Village star from a background of panys rises and crime; in the picture poverty means nothing worse than privatithe poet in the presence of the most tragic out fortune could still > " Have laughed himself to seorn to find In that decrepit man so firm a mind,"

Nay, even when a state far below the Leech-Gathere been reached, and mind and body alike are in the decay, the life of the Old Cumberland Beggar, at one remove from nothingness, has yet a dignity and a usefulness of its own. His fading days are passed in no sad asylum of vicious or gloomy age, but amid neighbourly kindnesses, and in the sanity of the open air; and a life that is reduced to its barest elements has yet a hold on the liberality of nature and the affections of human hearts.

So long as the inhabitants of a region so solitary and beautiful have neither many arts nor many wishes, save such as the nature which they know has suggested, and their own handiwork can satisfy, so long are their presence and habitations likely to be in harmony with the scenes around them. Nay, man's presence is almost always needed to draw out the full meaning of Nature, to illustrate her bounty by his glad well-being, and to hint by his contrivances of precaution at her might and terror. Wordsworth's description of the cottages of Cumberland depicts this unconscious adaptation of man's abode to his surroundings, with an eye which may be called at pleasure that of painter or of poet.

"The dwelling-houses and contiguous out-houses are in many instances of the colour of the native rock out of which they have been built; but frequently the dwelling—or Fire-house, as it is ordinarily called—has been distinguished from the barn or byre by rougheast and whitewash, which, as the inhabitants are not hasty in renewing it, in a few years acquires by the influence of weather a tint at once sober and variegated. As these houses have been, from father to son, inhabited by persons engaged in the same occupations, yet necessarily with changes in their circumstances, they have received without incongruity additions and accommodations adapted to the needs of each successive occupant, who, being for the most part proprietor, was at liberty to follow his own fancy, so that these humble dwellings remind the contemplative spectator of a production of nature, and may (using a strong expression) rather be said to have grown than to have been creeted—to have risen, by an instinct of their own, out of the native rock. - so little is there in them of fornulity, such is their wildness and beauty.

"These dwellings, mostly built, as has been said, of rough uplown stone, are roufed with states, which were rudely taken from the marry before the present art of splitting them was maler dead, and are therefore rough and uneven in their aurface, so that both the coverings and sides of the houses have futuided places of rest for the seeds of lichens, mosses, ferns, and thewers. Hence buddings, which in their very form call to mind the processes of nature, do thus, clothed in part with a vegetable gart, appear to be received into the bosom of the living principle of things, as it acts and exists among the woods and fields, and by their eideur and their shares affectingly direct the thoughts to that transpul course of nature and simplicity along which the humble minded inhabitants have through so many generations been led. Add the little garden with its shed for bee-hives, its small hed of potheries, and its barders and patched of flowers for Sunday posics, with sometimes a choice few too much prized to be plucked; an orchard of proportional size; a characpress, often supported by some tree near the door, a chester of embowering sycamores for summer shade, with a tall fir through which the winds sing when other trees are leathers; the little cill or household spout murmuring in all seguing , combine these incidents and images together, and you have the representative idea of a mountain cottage in this country on beautifully formed in itself, and so richly adorned by the hand of Nature."

These brief descriptions may suffice to indicate the general character of a district which in Wordsworth's early days had a distinctive unity which he was the first fully to appreciate, which was at its best during his long lifetime, and which has already begun to disappear. The mountains had waited long for a full adoration, an intelligent worship. At last "they were enough beloved." And if now the changes wrought around them recall too often the poet's warning, how

"All that now delights thee, from the day On which it should be touched, shall melt, and melt away -"

yet they have gained something which cannot be taken from them. Not mines, nor railways, nor monster excursions, nor reservoirs, nor Manchester herself, "toute entière à sa proie attachée," can deprive lake and hill of Wordsworth's memory, and the love which once they knew.

Wordsworth's life was from the very first so ordered as to give him the most complete and intimate knowledge both of district and people. There was scarcely a mile of ground in the Lake country over which he had not wandered; scarcely a prospect which was not linked with his life by some tie of memory. Born at Cockermouth, on the outskirts of the district, his mind was gradually led on to its beauty; and his first recollections were of Derwent's grassy holms and rocky falls, with Skiddaw, "bronzed with deepest radiance," towering in the eastern sky. Sent to school at Hawkshead at eight years old, Wordsworth's scene was transferred to the other extremity of the Lake district. It was in this quaint old town, on the banks of Esthwaite Water, that the "fair seed-time of his soul" was passed; it was here that his boyish delight in exercise and adventure grew, and melted in its turn into a more impersonal yearning, a deeper absorption into the beauty and the wonder of the world. And even the records of his boyish amusements come to us each on a background of nature's majesty and calm. Setting springs for woodcock on the grassy moors at night, at nine years old, he feels himself "a trouble to the peace" that dwells among the moon and stars overhead; and when he has appropriated a woodcock caught by somebody else, "sounds of undistinguishable motion" embody the viewless pursuit of Nemesis among the solitary hills. In the perilous search for the raven's nest, as he hangs on the face of the naked crags of Yewdale, he feels for the first tin sense of detachment from external things which a p of strange unreality will often force on the mind.

Oh, at that time
When on the perilous ridge I hung alone,
With what strange utterance did the loud dry wind
Blow through my ear! the sky seemed not a sky
Of earth—and with what notion moved the clouds!"

The innocent rapine of nutting taught him to fe there is a spirit in the woods—a presence which to a touch of ours will descerate and destroy.

The neighbouring lakes of Coniston, Esthwaite, V mere, have left similar traces of the gradual underile his spirit. It was on a promontory on Coniston th sun's last rays, gilding the eastern hills above wh had first appeared, suggested the boy's first impu spontaneous poetry, in the resolve that, wherever life lead him, his last thoughts should fall on the scenes his childhood was passing now. It was on Esthwai the "huge peak" of Wetherlam, following him seemed) as he rowed across the starlit water, suggest dim conception of "unknown modes of being," and that is not ours. It was round Esthwaite that t used to wander with a friend at early dawn, rejule the charm of words in tuneful order, and repeati gether their favourite verses, till "sounds of ext echoed through the groves." It was on Esthwai the band of skaters "hissed along the polished games confederate," from which Wordsworth would times withdraw himself and pause suddenly in full to feel in that dizzy silence the mystery of a rolling

A passage, less frequently quoted, in describing .

cursion on Windermere illustrates the effect of some point of human interest in concentrating and realise diffused emotion which radiates from a scene of

"But, ere nightfall,
When in our pinnace we returned at leisure
Over the shadowy lake, and to the beach
Of some small island steered our course with one,
The ministrel of the troop, and left him there,
And rowed off gently, while he blew his flute
Alone upon the rock—oh, then the calm
And dead still water lay upon my mind
Even with a weight of pleasure, and the sky,
Never before so beautiful, sank down
Into my heart, and held me like a dream?"

passage which describes the school-boy's call to the the lines of which Coleridge said that he should xelaimed "Wordsworth!" if he had met them rundld in the deserts of Arabia paints a somewhat rush of feeling with a still deeper charm. The e shock of mild surprise "which in the pauses of rds' joeund din carries far into his heart the sound entain torrents—the very mineling of the grotesque e majestic brings home the contrast between our ory energies and the my tern around as which rever the same to the moments when we panse and pence.

round the two small lakes of Gramere and Rydal as memories of Word worth are most thickly class. On one or other of these lakes he lived for tifty the first half of the present century; and there is all that response half left with or winding valley has not heard him muranizing out his verses as lowly rose from his locat. The cottage at Towns end, Grasmere, where he first settled, is now surrounded by the out-buildings of a busy hotel, and the noisy stream of traffie, and the sight of the many villas which spot the valley, give a new pathos to the sonnet in which Wordsworth deplores the alteration which even his own residence might make in the simplicity of the lonely scene:

HAP.

"Well may'st thou halt, and gaze with brightening eye! The lovely cottage in the guardian nook. Hath stirred thee deeply; with its own dear brook, Its own small pasture, almost its own sky! But covet not the abode: forbear to sigh, As many do, repining while they look; Intruders—who would tear from Nature's book. This precious leaf with harsh impiety. Think what the home must be if it were thine, Even thine, though few thy wants! Roof, window, door, The very flowers are sacred to the poor, The roses to the porch which they entwine: Yea, all that now enchants thee, from the day. On which it should be touched, would melt, and melt away."

The Poems on the Naming of Places belong for the most part to this neighbourhood. Emma's Dell on Easdale Beck, Point Rash-Judgment on the eastern shore of Grasmere, Mary's Pool in Rydal Park, William's Penk on Stone Arthur, Joanna's Rock on the banks of Rotha, and John's Grove near White Moss Common, have been identified by the loving search of those to whom every memorial of that simple-hearted family group has still a charm.

It is on Greenhead Ghyll—"upon the forest-side in Grasmere Vale"—that the poet has laid the scene of Michael, the poem which paints with such detailed fidelity both the inner and the outward life of a typical Westmoreland "statesman." And the upper road from Grasmere to Rydal, superseded now by the road along the lakeside, and left as a winding foot-path among rock and fern, was one of his most habitual haunts. Of another such haunt his friend Lady Richardson says, "The Prelude was chiefly composed in a green mountain terrace, on the Easdale side of Helm Crag, known by the name of Under Lancrigg, a place which he used to say he knew by heart. The ladies sat at their work on the hill-side, while he walked to and fro on the smooth green mountain turf, humming out his verses to himself, and then repeating them to his sympathising and ready scribes, to be noted down on the spot, and transcribed at home."

The neighbourhood of the poet's later home at Rydal Mount is equally full of associations. Two of the Evening Voluntaries were composed by the side of Rydal Merc. The Wild Duck's Nest was on one of the Rydal islands. It was on the fells of Loughrigg that the poet's fancy loved to plant an imperial castle. And Wansfell's green slope still answers with many a change of glow and shadow to the radiance of the sinking sun.

Hawkshead and Rydal, then, may be considered as the poet's principal centres, and the scenery in their neighbourhood has received his most frequent attention. The Duddon, a seldom-visited stream on the south-west border of the Lake district, has been traced by him from source to outfall in a series of sonnets. Langdale, and Little Langdale, with Blea Tarn lying in it, form the principal scene of the discourses in the Excursion. The more distant lakes and mountains were often visited, and are often alluded to. The scene of The Brothers, for example, is laid in Ennerdale; and the index of the minor poems will supply other instances. But it is chiefly round two lines of road leading from Grasmere that Wordsworth's associations cluster—the route over Dunmailraise, which led him to Keswick, to Coleridge and Southey at Greta Hall, and to other friends in that neighbourhood; and the route over Kirkstone, which led him to Ullswater, and the friendly houses of Patterdale, Hallsteads, and Lowther Castle. The first of these two routes was that over which the Waggoner plied; it skirts the levely shore of Thirlmere -a lonely sheet of water, of exquisite irregularity of outline, and fringed with delicate verdure, which the Corporation of Manchester has lately bought to embank it into a reservoir. Dedecorum pretiosus emptor! This lake was a favourite haunt of Wordsworth's; and upon a rock on its margin, where he and Coleridge, coming from Keswick and Grasmere, would often meet, the two poets, with the other members of Wordsworth's loving household group, inscribed the initial letters of their names. To the "monumental power" of this Rock of Names Wordsworth appeals, in lines written when the happy company who engraved them had already been severed by distance and death:

"O thought of pain, That would impair it or profane! And fail not Thou, loved Rock, to keep Thy charge when we are laid asleep."

The rock may still be seen, but is to be submerged in the new reservoir. In the vale of Keswick itself, Applethwaite, Skiddaw, St. Herbert's Island, Lodore, are commemorated in sonnets or inscriptions. And the Borrowdale yew-trees have inspired some of the poet's noblest lines—lines breathing all the strange forlornness of Glaramara's solitude, and the withering vault of shade.

The route from Rydal to Ullswater is still more thickly studded with poetic allusions. The Pass of Kirkstone is the theme of a characteristic ode; Grisdale Tarn and on recur again and again; and Aira Force was one pots which the poet best loved to describe, as well sit. It was on the shores of Further Gowbarrow Daffodils danced beneath the trees. These referight be much further multiplied; and the loving sof disciples has set before us "the Lake district preted by Wordsworth" through a multitude of But enough has been said to show how complete poet had absorbed the influences of his dweller; how unique a representative he had become of the district of his birth; how he had made it to him by comprehending it, and his own by sited other countries and described other scenes. , Wales, Switzerland, France, Germany, Italy, have ce in his works. His familiarity with other sceped him, doubtless, to a better appreciation of the intry than he could have gained had he never left , on the other hand, like Cæsar in Gaul, or Welin the Peninsular, it was because he had so comrasp of this chosen base of operations that he was ome, to see, and to make his own, so swiftly and ly elsewhere. Happy are those whose deep-rooted s cling like his about some stable home! whose the world around them has expanded from some of happy tranquillity, instead of being drawn at from the confusing city's roar! Happier still if y picture be of one of those rare scenes which pired poets and prophets with the retrospective m of a patriarchal, or a golden age; of some plot d like the Ithaca of Odysseus, τρηχεΐ, άλλ' άγαθή os, "rough, but a nurse of men;" of some life which a poet of kindred spirit to Wordsworth's saw half in vision, half in reality, among the husbandmen of the Italian hills:

"Peace, peace is theirs, and life no fraud that knows, Wealth as they will, and when they will, repose: On many a hill the happy homesteads stand, The living lakes through many a vale expand; Cool glens are there, and shadowy caves divine, Deep sleep, and far-off voices of the kine—From moor to moor the exulting wild deer stray; The strenuous youth are strong and sound as they; One reverence still the untainted race inspires, God their first thought, and after God their sires; These last discerned Astrea's flying hem, And Virtue's latest footsteps walked with them."

CHAPTER V.

MARRIAGE, -- SOCIETY. -- HIGHLAND TOUR.

ing days of the last century, the external events of may be said to come to an end. Even his mar-Miss Mary Hutchinson, of Penrith, on October 4, as not so much an importation into his existence emotion, as a development and intensification of which had long been there. This marriage was vning stroke of Wordsworth's felicity—the poetic ense for his steady advocacy of all simple and noble When he wished to illustrate the true dignity icacy of rustic lives he was always accustomed to the Cumbrian folk. And now it seemed that land requited him for his praises with her choicest ound for him in the country town of Penrith, and e small and obscure circle of his connexions and ance—nay, from the same dame's school in which taught to read—a wife such as neither rank nor eauty nor glowing genius enabled his brother bards

Vordsworth's settlement at Townend, Grasmere, in Wordsworth's poetic appreciativeness, manifest to knew her, is attested by the poet's assertion that the best lines in the poem of The Daffodils—

"They flash upon that inward eye Which is the blies of solitude "--

were of her composition. And in all other matters, from the highest to the lowest, she was to him a true helpmate, a companion "dearer far than life and light are dear," and able "in his steep march to uphold him to the end." Devoted to her husband, she nevertheless welcomed not only without jealousy but with delight the household companionship through life of the sister who formed so large an element in his being. Admiring the poet's genius to the full, and following the workings of his mind with a sympathy that never fired, she nevertheless was able to discern, and with unobtrusive care to hide or avert, those errors of manner into which retirement and self-alcountion will betray even the gentlest spirit. It speaks, perhaps, equally well for Wordsworth's character that this tendency to a lengthy insistence, in general conver ation, on his own feelings and ideas is the worst charge that can be brought against him; and for Mrs. Wordsworth's, that her simple and rustic upbringing had gifted her with a manner so gracious and a tact so ready that in her presence all things could not but go well.

The life which the young couple led was one of primitive simplicity. In some respects it was even less luxurious than that of the peasants around them. They drank water, and ate the simplest fare. Miss Wordsworth had long rendered existence possible for her brother on the narrowest of means by her unselfish energy and skill in household management; and "plain living and high thinking" were equally congenial to the new inmate of the fragal home. Wordsworth gardened; and all together, or oftenest the poet and his sister, wandered almost daily over the neighbouring hills. Narrow means did not prevent them from offering a generous welcome to their few friends, especially Coleridge and his family, who repeatedly stayed for months under Wordsworth's roof. Miss Wordsworth's unpublished letters breathe the very spirit of hospitality in their naive details of the little sacrifices gladly made for the sake of the presence of these honoured guests. But for the most part their life was solitary and uneventful. Books they had few; neighbours almost none; and Miss Wordsworth's diary of these early years describes a life seldom paralleled in its intimate dependence on external I take, almost at random, her account of a single day. "November 24, 1801. Read Chancer. We walked by Gell's cottage. As we were going along we were stopped at once, at the distance, perhaps, of fifty yards from our favourite birch-tree; it was yielding to the gust of wind, with all its tender twigs; the sun shone upon it, and it glanced in the wind like a flying sunshiny shower. It was a tree in shape, with stem and branches; but it was like a spirit of water. After our return William read Spenser to us, and then walked to John's Grove. Went to meet W." And from an unpublished letter of Miss Wordsworth's, of about the same period (September 10, 1800), I extract her description of the new home. are daily more delighted with Grasmere and its neighbourhood. Our walks are perpetually varied, and we are more fond of the mountains as our acquaintance with them increases. We have a boat upon the lake, and a small orchard and smaller garden, which, as it is the work of our own hands, we regard with pride and partiality. Our cottage is quite large enough for us, though very small; and we have made it neat and comfortable within doors; and it looks very nice on the outside; for though the roses and honeysuckles which we have planted against it are only of this year's growth, yet it is covered all over with green leaves and searlet flowers; for we have trained searlet beans upon threads, which are not only exceedingly beautiful but very useful, as their produce is immense. We have made a lodging room of the parlour below stairs, which has a stone floor, therefore we have covered it all over with matting. We sit in a room above stairs, and we have one lodging room with two single beds, a sort of lumber room, and a small, low, unceiled room, which I have papered with newspapers, and in which we have put a small bed. Our servant is an old woman of sixty years of age, whom we took partly out of charity. She was very ignorant, very foolish, and very difficult to teach. But the goodness of her disposition, and the great convenience we should find if my perseverance was successful, induced me to go on."

The sonnets entitled Personal Talk give a vivid picture of the blessings of such seclusion. There are many minds which will echo the exclamation with which the poet dismisses his visitors and their gossip:

"Better than such discourse doth silence long, Long barren silence, square with my desire; To sit without emotion, hope, or aim, In the loved presence of my cottage fire, And listen to the flapping of the flame, Or kettle whispering its faint undersong."

Many will look with envy on a life which has thus decisively cut itself loose from the world; which is secure from the influx of those preoccupatione, at once distracting and nugatory, which deaden the mind to all other stimulus, and split the river of life into channels so minute that it loses itself in the sand.

"Hence have I genial seasons; hence have I Smooth passions, smooth discourse, and joyens thought." herself, the mind can expatiate in those kingdoms sirit bequeathed to us by past generations and distant, which to the idle are but a garden of idleness, nose who choose it become a true possession and videning home. Among those "nobler loves and ares" there is excitement without reaction, there wearied and impersonal joy—a joy which can only cheap because it is so abundant, and can only distust through our own incapacity to contain it. dights of study and of solitude Wordsworth enthe full. In no other poet, perhaps, have the hightened sensibilities been productive of a pleasumixed with pain. The wind of his emotions at abaft; he "swam smoothly in the stream of his ablived but one man."

lessing of meditative and lonely hours must of purchased by corresponding limitations. Wordsonception of human character retained to the end me simplicity. Many of life's most impressive na were hid from his eyes. He never encounterf those rare figures whose aspect seems to justify ions of pomp and pre-eminence when they appear tely scenes as with a natural sovereignty. He chieved nor underwent any of those experiences n make all high romance seem a part of memory, ow, as it were, a password and introduction into innermost of human fates. On the other hand, t wholly escaped those sufferings which exceptions must needs derive from too close a contact with monplace world. It was not his lot—as it has lot of so many poets—to move amongst mankind s an intimate and a stranger; to travel from disent to disillusionment, and from regret to regret;

to construct around him a world of ideal beinerumble into dust at his touch; to hope from their they can neither understand nor according to be be them what they can never repeat. Such pain, indobecome a discipline; and the electronitact with man may teach to the poetic nature le our of contacte, suppression, of resolute good will, and may trunder an added dignity the tunnil of emotions which mis have run riot in his heart. Yet it is be soften from of self-control than from most, of ell'abandentae the fount of pactry springs; and herein it was that worth's especial felicity lay esthat there was no one in him which the world had either represed or t that he had no joy which might not be the harm! of all; and that, therefore, it was when he was more servedly himself that he was not a profoundly human that was needful for him was to strike down into the of his heart. Or, using his own words, we must es his tranquil existence to

"A ery dal river,
Diaphanous because it reavels showly," and in which poetic thoughts row unimpeded to t face, like bubbles through the pelimid stream.

The first hint of many of his briefer poems i found in his sister's diary:

"April 15, 1802.—When we were in the world below Goe Park we saw a few difficilly close to the water lake. As along there were more, and yet more; and at last, under the of the trees, we saw there was a long belt of the a alone the I never saw diffodils so beautiful. They given among the stones about them; some rested their heads on the stone as low; the rest toesed, and recled, and danced, and warned a verily danced with the wind, they looked so gay and planeing

"July 30, 1802.—Left London between five and six o'clock of the morning, outside the Dover coach. A beautiful morning. The city, St. Paul's, with the river, a multitude of little boats, made a beautiful sight as we crossed Westminster Bridge; the houses not overhung by their clouds of smoke, were spread out endlessly; yet the sun shone so brightly, with such a pure light, that there was something like the purity of one of nature's own grand spectacles. Arrived at Calais at four in the morning of July 31st. Delightful walks in the evenings, seeing far off in the west the coast of England like a cloud, crested with Dover Castle, the evening star, and the glory of the sky. The reflections in the water were more beautiful than the sky itself; purple waves brighter than precious stones for ever melting away upon the sands."

How simple are the elements of these delights! There is nothing here, except fraternal affection, a sunrise, a sunset, a flock of bright wild flowers; and yet the sonnets on Westminster Bridge and Calais Sands, and the stanzas on the Daffodils, have taken their place among the permanent records of the profoundest human joy.

Another tour—this time through Scotland—undertaken in August, 1803, inspired Wordsworth with several of his best pieces. Miss Wordsworth's diary of this tour has been lately published, and should be familiar to all lovers of nature. The sister's journal is, indeed, the best introduction to the brother's poems. It has not—it cannot have—their dignity and beauty; but it exemplifies the same method of regarding Nature, the same self-identification with her subtler aspects and entrance into her profounder charm. It is interesting to notice how the same impression strikes both minds at once. From the sister's it is quickly reflected in words of exquisite delicacy and simplicity; in the brother's it germinates, and reappears, it may be months or years afterwards, as the nucleus of a mass of thought and feeling which has grown round it in his musing soul. The travellers' encounter with two Highland girls on the shore of Loch Lomond is a good instance of this. "One of the girls," writes Miss Wordsworth, "was exceedingly beautiful; and the figures of both of them, in grey plaids falling to their feet, their faces only being uncovered, excited our attention before we spoke to them; but they answered us so sweetly that we were quite delighted, at the same time that they stared at us with an innocent look of wonder. I think I never heard the English language sound more sweetly than from the mouth of the elder of these girls, while she stood at the gate answering our inquiries, her face flushed with the rain; her pronunciation was clear and distinct, without difficulty, yet slow, as if like a foreign speech."

"A face with gladness overspread!
Soft smiles, by human kindness bred!
And seemliness complete, that sways
Thy courtesies, about thee plays;
With no restraint, but such as springs
From quick and eager visitings
Of thoughts that lie beyond the reach
Of thy few words of English speech:
A bondage sweetly brooked, a strife
That gives thy gestures grace and life!
So have I, not unmoved in mind,
Seen birds of tempes begins the wind."

The travellers saw more of this girl, and Miss Wordsworth's opinion was confirmed. But to Wordsworth his glimpse of her became a veritable romance. He commensorated it in his poem of The Highland Girl, soon after his return from Scotland; he narrated it once more in his poem of The Three Cottage Girls, written nearly twenty afterwards; and "the sort of prophecy," he says in , "with which the verses conclude has, through God's ness, been realized; and now, approaching the close y seventy-third year, I have a most vivid remembrance or and the beautiful objects with which she was surded." Nay, more; he has elsewhere informed us, some näiveté, that the first few lines of his exquisite to his wife, She was a phantom of delight, were nally composed as a description of this Highland, who would seem almost to have formed for him ever wards a kind of type and image of loveliness.

at such a meeting as this should have formed so remembered an incident in the poet's life will appear. ps, equally ridiculous to the philosopher and to the of the world. The one would have given less, the would have demanded more. And yet the quest of y, like the quest of truth, reaps its surest reward it is disinterested as well as keen; and the true lover mankind will often draw his most exquisite moments what to most men seems but the shadow of a joy. cially, as in this case, his heart will be prodigal of the lses of that protecting tenderness which it is the blessof early girlhood to draw forth unwittingly, and to unknown—affections which lead to no declaration, lesire no return; which are the spontaneous effluence e very Spirit of Love in man; and which play and around winning innocence like the coruscations I the head of the unconscious Iulus, a soft and unming flame.

was well, perhaps, that Wordsworth's romance should to him in this remote and fleeting fashion. For to Priest of Nature it was fitting that all things else d be harmonious, indeed, but accessory; that joy should not be so keen, nor sorrow so desolating, nor itself so wildly strong, as to prevent him from going upon the mountains with a heart at peace, and rece "in a wise passiveness" the voices of earth and heav

CHAPTER VI.

SIR GEORGE BEAUMONT .- DEATH OF JOHN WORDSWORTH.

THE year 1803 saw the beginning of a friendship which formed a valuable element in Wordsworth's life. George Beaumont, of Coleorton Hall, Essex, a descendant of the dramatist, and representative of a family long distinguished for talent and culture, was staying with Coleridge at Greta Hall, Keswick, when, hearing of Coleridge's affection for Wordsworth, he was struck with the wish to bring Wordsworth also to Keswick, and bought and presented to him a beautiful piece of land at Applethwaite. under Skiddaw, in the hope that he might be induced to settle there. Coleridge was soon afterwards obliged to leave England in search of health, and the plan fell through. A characteristic letter of Wordsworth's records his feelings on the occasion. "Dear Sir George," he writes, "if any person were to be informed of the particulars of your kindness to me-if it were described to him in all its delicacy and nobleness-and he should afterwards be told that I suffered eight weeks to elapse without writing to you one word of thanks or acknowledgment, he would deem it a thing absolutely impossible. It is nevertheless true.

"Owing to a set of painful and uneasy sensations which I have, more or less, at all times about my chest, I deferred writing to you, being at first made still more uncomfortable by travelling, and loathing to do violence to myself in what ought to be an act of pure pleasure and enjoyment, viz., the expression of my deep sense of your goodness. This feeling was indeed so strong in me as to make me look upon the act of writing to you as a thing not to be done but in my best, my purest, and my happiest moments. Many of these I had, but then I had not my pen, ink, and paper before me, my conveniences, 'my appliances and means to boot;' all which, the moment that I thought of them, seemed to disturb and impair the sanctity of my pleasure. I contented myself with thinking over my complacent feelings, and breathing forth solitary gratulations and thank givings, which I did in many a sweet and many a wild place, during my late tour."

The friendship of which this act of delicate generodity was the beginning was maintained till Sir George Beammont's death in 1827, and formed for many years Wordsworth's closest link with the world of art and culture. Sir George was himself a painter as well as a connect som, and his landscapes are not without indications of the strong feeling for nature which he undoubtedly possessed. Wordsworth, who had seen very few pictures, but was a penetrating critic of those which he knew, discerned this vein of true feeling in his friend's work, and has idealized a small landscape which Sir George had given him, in a sonnet which reproduces the sense of happy pause and voluntary fixation with which the mind throws itself into some scene where art has given "To one brief moment caught from fleeting time.

The appropriate calm of blest eternity."

There was another pursuit in which Sir George Reaumont was much interested, and in which painter and poet were well fitted to unite. The landscape-gardener, as Wordsworth says, should "work in the spirit of Nature, with an invisible hand of art." And he shows how any real success can only be achieved when the designer is willing to incorporate himself with the scenery around him; to postpone to its indications the promptings of his own pride or caprice; to interpret Nature to herself by completing touches; to correct her with deference, and, as it were, to caress her without importunity. And rising to that aspect of the question which connects it with human society, he is strenuous in condemnation of that taste, not so much for solitude as for isolation, which can tolerate no neighbourhood, and finds its only enjoyment in the sense of monopoly.

"Laying out grounds, as it is called, may be considered as a liberal art in some sort like poetry and painting; its object ought to be to move the affections under the control of good-sense; and surely the affections of those who have the deepest perception of the beauty of Nature—who have the most valuable feelings, that is, the most permanent, the most independent, the most ennobling, connected with Nature and human life. No liberal art aims merely at the gratification of an individual or a class; the painter or poet is degraded in proportion as he does so. The true servants of the arts pay homage to the human-kind as impersonated in unwarped and onlightened minds. If this be so when we are merely putting together words or colours, how much more ought the feeling to prevail when we are in the midst of the realities of things; of the beauty and harmony. of the joy and happiness, of loving creatures; of men and children, of birds and beasts, of hills and streams, and trees and flowers; with the changes of night and day, evening and morning, summer and winter; and all their unwearied actions and energies, as benign in the spirit that animates them as they are beautiful and grand in that form of clothing which is given to them for the delight of our senses! What, then, shall we say of many great mansions, with their unqualified expulsion of human creatures from their neighbourhood, happy or not; houses which do what is fabled of the upos-tree—breathe out death and desolation! For my part, strip my neighbourhood of human beings, and I should think it one of the greatest privations I could undergo. You have all the poverty of solitude, nothing of its elevation."

This passage is from a letter of Wordsworth's to Sir George Beaumont, who was engaged at the time in rebuilding and laying out Colcorton. The poet himself planned and superintended some of these improvements, and wrote, for various points of interest in the grounds, inscriptions which form dignified examples of that kind of composition.

Nor was Sir George Beaumont the only friend whom the poet's taste assisted in the choice of a site or the disposition of pleasure ground. More than one seat in the Lake country—among them one home of pre-eminent beauty—have owed to Wordsworth no small part of their ordered charm. In this way, too, the poet is with as still; his presence has a strange reality as we look on some majestic prospect of interwinding lake and mountain which his design has made more beautifully visible to the children's children of those he loved; as we stand, perhaps, in some shadowed garden ground where his will has had its way—has framed Helvellyn's far-off summit in an arch of tossing green, and embayed in towering forest-trees the long lawns of a silent valley—fit haunt for lofty aspiration and for brooding calm.

But of all woodland ways which Wordsworth's skill designed or his feet frequented, not one was dearer to him (if I may pass thus by a gentle transition to another of the strong affections of his life) than a narrow path through a firwood near his cottage, which "was known to the poet's household by the name of John's Grove."

For in the year 1800 his brother, John Wordsworth, a few years younger than himself, and captain of an East Indiaman, had spent eight months in the poet's cottage at Grasmere. The two brothers had seen little of each other since childhood, and the poet had now the delight of discovering in the sailor a character congenial to his own, and an appreciation of poetry—and of the Lyrical Ballads especially—which was intense and delicate in an unusual degree. In both brothers, too, there was the same love of nature; and after John's departure, the poet pleased himself with imagining the visions of Grasmere which beguiled the watches of many a night at sea, or with tracing the pathway which the sailor's instinct had planned and trodden amid trees so thickly planted as to baffle a less practised skill. John Wordsworth, on the other hand, looked forward to Grasmere as the final goal of his wanderings, and intended to use his own savings to set the poet free from worldly cares.

Two more voyages the sailor made with such hopes as these, and amid a frequent interchange of books and letters with his brother at home. Then, in February, 1805, he set sail from Portsmouth, in command of the "Abergavenny" East Indiaman, bound for India and China. Through the incompetence of the pilot who was taking her out of the Channel, the ship struck on the Shambles off the Bill of Portland, on February 5, 1805. "She struck," says Wordsworth, "at 5 p.m. Guns were fired immediately, and were continued to be fired. She was gotten off the rock at half-past seven, but had taken in so much water, in spite of constant pumping, as to be water-logged. They had, however, hope that she might still be run upon Weymouth sands, and with this view continued pumping and baling till eleven, when she went down.... A few minutes before the ship went down my brother was seen talking to the first mate with apparent cheerfulness; and he was standing on the hen coop, which is the point from which he could overlook the whole ship, the moment she went down—dying, as he had lived, in the very place and point where his duty stationed him."

"For myself," he continues obsewhere, "I feel that there is something cut out of my life which cannot be restored. I never thought of him but with hope and delight. We looked forward to the time, not distant, as we thought, when he would settle near us swhen the task of his life would be over, and he would have nothing to do but reap his reward. By that time I hoped also that the chief part of my labours would be executed, and that I should be able to show him that he had not placed a false confidence I never wrote a line without a thought of giving him pleasure; my writings, printed and manuscript, were his delight, and one of the chief solaces of his long vov-But let me stop. I will not be cast down; were it only for his sake, I will not be dejected. I have much yet to do, and pray God to give me strength and power; his part of the agreement between us is brought to an end, mine continues; and I hope, when I shall be able to think of him with a calmer mind, that the remembrance of him dead will even animate me more than the joy which I had in him living."

In these and the following reflections there is nothing of novelty; yet there is an interest in the spectacle of this strong and simple mind confronted with the universal problems, and taking refuge in the thoughts which have satisfied, or scarcely satisfied, so many extension, of mourning men.

&quot;A thousand times have I asked myself, as your tender

hy led me to do, 'Why was he taken away?' and I nswered the question as you have done. In fact, is no other answer which can satisfy, and lay the trest. Why have we a choice, and a will, and a of justice and injustice, enabling us to be moral

Why have we sympathies that make the best of fraid of inflicting pain and sorrow, which yet we see yout so lavishly by the Supreme Governor? Why our notions of right towards each other, and to all a beings within our influence, differ so widely from opears to be his notion and rule, if everything were ere? Would it not be blasphemy to say that, upon position of the thinking principle being destroyed by, however inferior we may be to the great Cause ler of things, we have more of love in our nature has? The thought is monstrous; and yet how to off it, except upon the supposition of another and a orld, I do not see."

this calamity, as from all the lessons of life, Wordstrew all the benefit which it was empowered to "A deep distress hath humanized my soul"—what poetry does not know the pathetic lines in which witness to the teaching of sorrow? Other griefs, ad—the loss of two children in 1812; his sister's illness, beginning in 1832; his daughter's death in All these he felt to the full; and yet, until his 's death, which was more than his failing energies ar, these bereavements were but the thinly-scatters "in a great sea of blue"—seasons of mourning there among years which never lost their hold on which knew no shame and no remorse, no desolation fear; whose days were never long with wearitheir nights broken at the touch of woe. Even when we speak of his tribulation s, it is his happiness rises in our minds.

And incomment as this felicity is the great fact of V worth's life scince his history is for the most part I history of a haloyon calm—we find our elve forced up question whether each a life is to be held desirable Happiness with honor was the ideal of Solon; is ours? To the modern opirit sto the Christian, in cars counsels of perfection have left "a presence that to be put by," this question, at which a Greek would smiled, is of no such easy solution.

To us, perhaps, in computing the fortune of at whom we hold dear, it may been more modful to i not whether he has had enough of joy, but whether had enough of sorrow: whether the blows of circum have wholly shaped his character from the rock; w his soul has taken lustre and parity in the refiner Nor is it only (as some might say) for violent and natures that sorrow is the best. It is true that by a only can the head-trong and pre-imptuous, pirit beinto gentleness and colemnized into lamility. But is used also by the Power above us in cases where w would have shrunk in horror from to rough a Natures that were already of a heroic uncelli line childlike purity, have been raised ere now by anound anguish, woe after woe, to a height of holiness wh may believe that they could have reached by no other Why should it not be so? since there is no limit soul's possible elevation, why should her parifying have any assignable end? She is of a metal which grow for ever brighter in the fiercening flame. then, we would still pronounce the true Beatitude: the rejoicing, the satisfied, the highly honoured, bu an ancient and sterner pattern, what account are we to give of Wordsworth's long years of blissful calm?

In the first place, we may say that his happiness was as wholly free from vulgar or transitory elements as a man's It lay in a life which most men would have found austere and blank indeed; a life from which not Crosus only but Solon would have turned in scorn; a life of poverty and retirement, of long apparent failure, and honour that came tardily at the close; it was a happiness nourished on no sacrifice of other men, on no eager appropriation of the goods of earth, but springing from a single eye and a loving spirit, and wrought from those primary emotions which are the innocent birthright of all. be answered that, however truly philosophic, however sacredly pure, his happiness may have been, yet its wisdom and its holiness were without an effort, and that it is effort which makes the philosopher and the saint: then we must use in answer his own Platonic scheme of things, to express a thought which we can but dimly apprehend; and we must say that, though progress be inevitably linked in our minds with struggle, yet neither do we conceive of struggle as without a pause; there must be prospect places in the long ascent of souls; and the whole of this earthly life -this one existence, standing we know not where among the myriad that have been for us or shall be-may not be too much to occupy with one of those outlooks of vision and of prophecy, when

"In a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore."

CHAPTER VII.

"HAPPY WARRIOR," AND PATRIOTIC POEMS

brother, brought with it also another death, which by the whole English nation like a private calamity emotion which Wordsworth felt at the news of T—the way in which he managed to intertwine the m of Nelson and of his own brother in his heart—mind us fitly at this point of our story of the distribution perplexity of nations which for so many years sure the quiet Grasmere home, and of the strong resonation with which the poet met each shock of E.

fates.

The year 1805, which bereft Wordsworth of a

When England first took up arms against the revolution, Wordsworth's feeling, as we have so been one of unmixed sorrow and shame. Blood terrible as the revolution had become, it was still is sort representative of human freedom; at any might still seem to contain per Ballile of progress the retrograde despotisms with which England herself could never know. But the conditions of the test changed before long. France had not the which she had seemed chosen among the nations, her conduct towards Switzerland which designeds

vil.] "HAPPY WARRIOR," AND PATRIOTIC POEMS. 75

dsworth's view. He saw her valiant spirit of selfnce corrupted into lust of glory; her eagerness for the tion of unjust privilege turned into a contentment equality of degradation under a despot's heel. "One of men the meanest too"—for such the First Consul needs appear to the moralist's eye—was history herself seemed vulgarized by the repetition of ancient tales of war and overthrow on a scale of such rent magnitude, but with no glamour of distance to the baseness of the agencies by which the destinies urope were shaped anew. This was an occasion that the hearts of men; it was not easy to remain through cose years at once undazzled and untempted, and never the blackest hour to despair of human virtue.

"Raised up to sway the world—to do, undo; With mighty nations for his underlings."

his tract on The Convention of Cintra, 1808, Wordsh has given the fullest expression to this undaunted per:

ppression, its own blind and predestined enemy, has poured this essedness upon Spain—that the enormity of the outrages of a she has been the victim has created an object of love and of d, of apprehensions and of wishes, adequate (if that be possible) to utmost demands of the human spirit. The heart that serves a cause, if it languish, must languish from its own constitutional ness, and not through want of nourishment from without. But a belief propagated in books, and which passes currently among ag men as part of their familiar wisdom, that the hearts of the are constitutionally weak, that they do languish, and are slow swer to the requisitions of things. I entreat those who are in the lelusion to look behind them and about them for the evidence perience. Now this, rightly understood, not only gives no supto any such belief, but proves that the truth is in direct opposition to it. The history of all ages-tunults after tunults eign or civil, with short or with no breathing places from a to generation; the senseless weaving and interweaving o vanishing, and reviving, and piercing each other like the Lights; public commotions, and those in the breast of the i the long calenture to which the Lover is subject; the blac blast of the desert, which aweeps perennially through a fri itude of its own making in the mind of the Gamester; ; quickening, but ever quickening, descent of appetite down Miser is propelled; the agony and cleaving oppression of ghost-like hauntings of shame; the inculors of revenge; the temper of ambition . . . these demonstrate incontestable passions of men (I mean the soul of sensibility in the hear in all quarrels, in all contests, in all quests, in all delig employments which are either sought by men or thrust u do immensurably transcend their objects. The true sorrow ity consists in this -- not that the mind of man fails, but cause and demands of action and of life so rarely correspon dignity and intensity of human desires; and hence, that wh to languish is too easily turned aside and abused. Hut, w membrance of what has been done, and in the face of the nable evils which are threatened, a Spaniard can never hav complain of this while a follower of the tyrant remains in a the Peninsula."

It was passages such as this, perhaps, which ning to declare that Wordsworth's pamphlet was a piece of political eloquence which had appear Burke. And yet if we compare it with Burke, the great Greek exemplar of all those who we speech the cogency of act—we see at once the cits practical failure. In Demosthenes the thouse principles are often as lofty as any patriot can but their loftiness, in his speech, as in the very things, seemed but to add to their immediate. They were beaten and inwoven into the facts of taction seemed to turn on them as on its only pivot; it was as though Virtue and Freedom hung armed in heaven above the assembly, and in the visible likeness of immortal ancestors beckoned upon an urgent way. Wordsworth's mood of mind, on the other hand, as he has depicted it in two sonnets written at the same time as his tract, explains why it was that that appeal was rather a solemn protest than an effective exhortation. In the first sonnet he describes the surroundings of his task—the dark wood and rocky cave, "the hollow vale which foaming torrents fill with omnipresent murmur:"

"Here mighty Nature! in this school sublime
I weigh the hopes and fears of suffering Spain;
For her consult the auguries of time,
And through the human heart explore my way,
And look and listen, gathering whence I may Triumph, and thoughts no bondage can restrain."

And then he proceeds to conjecture what effect his tract will produce:

"I dropped my pen, and listened to the wind,
That sang of trees uptorn and vessels tost;
A midnight harmony, and wholly lost
To the general sense of men, by chains confined
Of business, care, or pleasure,—or resigned
To timely sleep. Thought I, the impassioned strain
Which without aid of numbers I sustain
Like acceptation from the world will find."

This deliberate and lonely emotion was fitter to inspire grave poetry than a pamphlet appealing to an immediate crisis. And the sonnets dedicated To Liberty (1802–16) are the outcome of many moods like these.

It is little to say of these sonnets that they are the most permanent record in our literature of the Napoleonic war.

For that distinction they have few competitors. Two magnificent songs of Campbell's, an ode of Coloridge's, a few spirited stanzas of Byron's Arangels enough there is little besides these that fives in the national memory, till we come to the ode which summed up the long contest a generation later, when its great captain passed away. But these Sounds to Liberty are worthy of comparison with the noblest preserves of periodic version range which all our history has inspired the pressures where Shak speare brings his rays to focus on "this earth, this realms this England" or where the dread of national dishonour has kindled Chatham to an iron glow or where Milton rises from the polemie into the prophet, and Burke from the partisan into the partisa. The armoury of Wordsworth, indeed, was not forged with the same fire as that of these "invincible knights of old." He had not awayed senates, nor directed policies, nor gathered into one ardent become all the spirit of a heroic age. But he had deeply felt what it is that makes the greatness of nations; in that extremity no man was more staunch than he; no man more unwaveringly disdained unrighteon; empire, or kept the might of moral forces more strafficile in view. Not Stein could place a manlier reliance on "a few strong instincts and a few plain rules;" not Fichte could invoke more convincingly the "great allies" which work with "Man's sensor sparable mind."

Here and there, indeed, throughout these sonnets are scattered strokes of high poetic admiration or scorn which could hardly be overmatched in Æachylus. Such is the indignant correction-

&quot; Call not the royal Swede unfortunate. Who never did to Fortune bend the knee!"

stern touch which closes a description of Flamis proclamation at the Isthmian games, according liborates Greece—

ce forbids me to dwell in detail on these noble

"A gift of that which is not to be given By all the blended powers of Earth and Heaven!"

-on the well-known sonnets to Venice, to Milton, on the generous tributes to the heroes of the con-Schill, Hoffer, Toussaint, Palafox; or on the scries contrast the instinctive greatness of the Spanish at bay with Napoleon's lying promises and inhuride. But if Napoleon's career afforded to Wordsa poetic example, impressive as that of Xerxes to reeks, of lawless and intoxicated power, there was f some contrasted figure more notable than Hoffer afox from which to draw the lessons which great is can teach of unselfish valour. Was there then an, by land or sea, who might serve as the poet's f the ideal hero? To an Englishman, at least, this on carries its own reply. For by a singular destiny d, with a thousand years of noble history behind s chosen for her best-beloved, for her national hero, Arminius from the age of legend, not a Henri from the age of chivalry, but a man whom men ring have seen and known. For, indeed, England the world as to this man were of one accord; and n victory, on his ship Victory, Nelson passed away. ill which shook mankind was of a nature such as s was never felt at any other death—so unanimous e feeling of friends and foes that earth had lost her ng example of impassioned self-devotedness and of honour.

And yet it might have seemed that between N nature and Wordsworth's there was little in co. The obvious limitations of the great Admiral's culticharacter were likely to be strongly felt by the philopoet. And a serious crime, of which Nelson wa monly, though, as now appears, erroneously, as paper be guilty, was sure to be judged by Wordswort great severity.

Wordsworth was, in fact, hampered by some suc ings of disapproval. He even tells us, with that affectionateness which often makes us smile, that had recourse to the character of his own brothe for the qualities in which the great Admiral appear him to have been deficient. But on these hesitat would be unjust to dwell. I mention them only to out the fact that between these two men, so differ outward fates -- between "the adored, the incom-Nelson" and the homely poet, " retired as noontide -there was a moral likeness so profound that the of the recluse was realized in the public life of the and, on the other hand, the hero himself is only completely heroic when his impotoned life stands of us from the solemn background of the poet's calm. surely these two natures taken together make the Englishman. Nor is there any portrait fitter the of The Happy Warrior to go forth to all lands as senting the English character at its height a figt ill-matching with "Plutarch's men."

For indeed this short poem is in itself a mar greatness; there is a Roman majesty in its simp

&lt;sup>1</sup> The researches of Sir Nicholas Nicolas (Letters and Desp. Lord Nelson, vol. vii., Appendix) have placed Lord Nelson's ion with Lady Hamilton in an unexpected light.

weighty speech. And what eulogy was ever nobler than that passage where, without definite allusion or quoted name, the poet depicts, as it were, the very summit of glory in the well-remembered aspect of the Admiral in his last and greatest hour?

"Whose powers shed round him, in the common strife,
Or mild concerns of ordinary life,
A constant influence, a peculiar grace;
But who, if he be called upon to face
Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined Great issues, good or bad for human kind,
Is happy as a Lover, and attired
With sudden brightness, like a Man inspired."

Or again, where the hidden thought of Nelson's womanly tenderness, of his constant craving for the green earth and home affections in the midst of storm and war, melts the stern verses into a sudden change of tone:

"He who, though thus endued as with a sense
And faculty for storm and turbulence,
Is yet a Soul whose master-bias leans
To home-felt pleasures and to gentle scenes;
Sweet images! which, wheresoe'er he be,
Are at his heart; and such fidelity
It is his darling passion to approve;
More brave for this, that he hath much to love."

Compare with this the end of the Song at Brougham Castle, where, at the words "alas! the fervent harper did not know—" the strain changes from the very spirit of chivalry to the gentleness of nature's calm. Nothing can be more characteristic of Wordsworth than contrasts like this. They teach us to remember that his accustomed mildness is the fruit of no indolent or sentimental peace; and that, on the other hand, when his counsels are sternest, and "his voice is still for war," this is no voice of hardness or of vainglory, but the reluctant resolution of a heart which fain would yield itself to other energies, and have no message but of love.

There is one more point in which the character of Nelson has fallen in with one of the lessons which Wordsworth is never tired of enforcing, the lesson that virtue grows by the strenuousness of its exercise, that it gains strength as it wrestles with pain and difficulty, and converts the shocks of circumstance into an energy of its proper glow. The Happy Warrior is one,

"Who, doomed to go in company with Pain,
And Fear, and Bloodshed, miserable train!
Turns his necessity to glorious gain;
In face of these doth exercise a power
Which is our human nature's highest dower;
Controls them and subdues, transmutes, bereaves
Of their bad influence, and their good receives;
By objects which might force the soul to abate
Her feeling, rendered more compassionate;"

and so further, in words which recall the womanly tenderness, the almost exaggerated feeling for others' pain, which showed itself memorally in face of the blazing Orient, and in the harbour at Teneriffe, and in the cockpit at Trafalgar.

In such lessons as these—such lessons as The Happy Warrior or the Patriotic Sonnets teach—there is, of course, little that is absolutely novel. We were already aware that the ideal hero should be as gentle as he is brave, that he should act always from the highest motives, nor greatly care for any reward save the consciousness of having done his duty. We were aware that the true strength of a nation is moral, and not material; that dominion which rests on mere military force is destined quickly to decay; that the tyrant, however admired and prosperous, is in reality despicable, and miserable, and alone; that the true man should face death itself rather than parley with dishonour. These truths are admitted in all ages; yet it is scarcely stretching language to say that they are known to but few men. Or at least, though in a great nation there be many who will act on them instinctively, and approve them by a self-surrendering faith, there are few who can so put them forth in speech as to bring them home with a fresh conviction and an added glow; who can sum up, like Æschylus, the contrast between Hellenic freedom and barbarian despotism in "one trump's peal that set all Greeks aflame;" can thrill, like Virgil, a world-wide empire with the recital of the august simplicities of early Rome.

To those who would know these things with a vital knowledge—a conviction which would remain unshaken were the whole world in arms for wrong—it is before all things necessary to strengthen the inner monitions by the companionship of these noble souls. And if a poet, by strong concentration of thought, by striving in all things along the upward way, can leave us in a few pages, as it were, a summary of patriotism, a manual of national honour, he surely has his place among his country's benefactors not only by that kind of courtesy which the nation extends to men of letters of whom her masses take little heed, but with a title as assured as any warrior or statesman, and with no less direct a claim.

CHAPTER VIII.

CHILDREN .-- LIFE AT RYDAL MOUNT. -- "THE EXCURSION."

Ir may be well at this point to return to the quiet chronicle of the poet's life at Grasmere; where his cottage was becoming too small for an increasing family. His eldest son, John, was born in 1803; his eldest daughter, Dorothy or Dora, in 1804. Then came Thomas, born 1806; and Catherine, born 1808; and the list is ended by William, born 1810, and now (1880) the only survivor. In the spring of 1808 Wordsworth left Townend for Allan Bank—a more roomy but an uncomfortable house, at the north end of Grasmere. From thence he removed for a time, in 1811, to the Parsonage at Grasmere.

Wordsworth was the most affectionate of fathers, and allusions to his children occur frequently in his poetry. Dora—who was the delight of his later years—has been described at length in The Triad. Shorter and simpler, but more completely successful, is the picture of Catherine in the little poem which begins "Loving she is, and tractable, though wild," with its homely simile for child-hood—its own existence sufficient to fill it with gladness:

"As a faggot sparkles on the hearth Not less if unattended and alone Than when both young and old sit gathered round And take delight in its activity."

The next notice of this beloved child is in the sonnet, "Surprised by joy, impatient as the wind," written when she had already been removed from his side. She died in 1812, and was closely followed by her brother Thomas. Wordsworth's grief for these children was profound, violent, and lasting, to an extent which those who imagine him as not only calm but passionless might have some difficulty in believing. "Referring once," says his friend Mr. Aubrey de Vere, "to two young children of his who had died about forty years previously, he described the details of their illnesses with an exactness and an impetuosity of troubled excitement such as might have been expected if the bereavement had taken place but a few weeks before. The lapse of time seemed to have left the sorrow submerged indeed, but still in all its first freshness. Yet I afterwards heard that at the time of the illness, at least in the case of one of the two children, it was impossible to rouse his attention to the danger. He chanced to be then under the immediate spell of one of those fits of poetic inspiration which descended on him like a cloud. Till the cloud had drifted, he could see nothing beyond."

This anecdote illustrates the fact, which to those who knew Wordsworth well was sufficiently obvious, that the characteristic calm of his writings was the result of no coldness of temperament, but of a deliberate philosophy. The pregnant force of his language in dealing with those dearest to him—his wife, his sister, his brother—is proof enough of this. The frequent allusions in his correspondence to the physical exhaustion brought on by the act of poetical composition indicate a frame which, though made robust by exercise and temperance, was by nature excitable rather than strong. And even in the direction in which we should least have expected it, there is reason to believe that there were expecities of feeling is which never broke from his control. "Had I I writer of love poetry," he is reported to have sail would have been natural to me to write it with a of warmth which could hardly have been approximy principles, and which might have been undefor the reader."

Wordsworth's paternal feedings, at any rate, whas been said, exceptionally strong; and the imporof remaining in a house filled with sorrowful merendered him doubly anxious to obtain a permanent "The house which I have for some time occupie writes to Lord Lonsdale, in January, 1813, " is the I age of Grasmere. It stands close by the charalysis I have found it absolutely necessary that we should place which, by recalling to our minds at every many the losses we have sustained in the course of the law would grievourly retard our progress towards that quillity which it is our duty to aim at." It happens Rydal Mount became vacant at this moment, and spring of 1813 the Wordsworths migrated to this favourite and last abode.

Rydal Mount has probably been oftener described any other English poet's home since Shakspeare; as homes, certainly, have been moulded into such cle cordance with their inmates' nature. The house, has been altered since Wordsworth's day, stands, is southward, on the rocky side of Nab Sear, above Lake. The garden was described by Bishop Wordsimmediately after his uncle's death, while every to walk and flowering alley spoke of the poet's toving He tells of the "tall ash-tree, in which a thrush has for hours together, during many years;" of the " num in which the osier cage of the doves was hung;" of the stone steps "in the interstices of which grow the yellow flowering poppy, and the wild geranium or Poor Robin"—

"Gay "With his red stalks upon a sunny day."

And then of the terraces—one levelled for Miss Fenwick's use, and welcome to himself in aged years; and one ascending, and leading to the "far terrace" on the mountain's side, where the poet was wont to murmur his verses as they came. Within the house were disposed his simple treasures: the ancestral almery, on which the names of unknown Wordsworths may be deciphered still; Sir George Beaumont's pictures of "The White Doe of Rylstone" and "The Thorn," and the cuckoo clock which brought vernal thoughts to cheer the sleepless bed of age, and which sounded its noonday summons when his spirit fled.

Wordsworth's worldly fortunes, as if by some benignant guardianship of Providence, were at all times proportioned to his successive needs. About the date of his removal to Rydal (in March, 1813) he was appointed, through Lord Lonsdale's interest, to the distributorship of stamps for the county of Westmoreland, to which office the same post for Cumberland was afterwards added. He held this post till August, 1842, when he resigned it without a retiring pension, and it was conferred on his second son. He was allowed to reside at Rydal, which was counted as a suburb of Ambleside; and as the duties of the place were light, and mainly performed by a most competent and devoted clerk, there was no drawback to the advantage of an increase of income which released him from anxiety as to the future. A more lucrative office—the collectorship of Whitehaven - was subsequently offered to him; but he declined it, "nor would exchange his Sabine valley for riches and a lond of care."

Though Wordsworth's life at Rydal was a retired one, it was not that of a recluse. As years went on he became more and more recognized as a centre of spiritual strength and illumination, and was sought not only by those who were already his neighbours, but by some who became so mainly for his sake. Southey at Keswick was a valued friend, though Wordsworth did not greatly esteem him as a poet. De Quincey, orlehally attracted to the district by admiration for Wordsworth, remained there for many years, and poured forth a criticism strangely compounded of the atterances of the hero-worshipper and the valet-dechambre. Professor Wilson, of the Noctex Ambrosiana, never showed, perhaps, to so much advantage as when he walked by the side of the master whose greatness he was one of the first to detect. Dr. Arnold of Rugby made the neighbouring home at Fox How a focus of warm affections and of intellectual life. And Hartley Coleridge, whose fairy childhood had inspired one of Wordsworth's happiest pieces, continued to lead among the dales of Westmoreland a life which showed how much of genius and goodness a single weakness can nullify.

Other friends there were, too, less known to fame, but of exceptional powers of appreciation and sympathy. The names of Mrs. Fletcher and her daughters, Lady Richardson and Mrs. Davy, should not be omitted in any record of the poet's life at Rydal. And many humbler neighbours may be recognized in the characters of the Excursion and other poems. The Wanderer, indeed, is a picture of Wordsworth himself—"an idea," as he says, "of what I fancied my own character might have become in his circumstances." But the Solitary was an appended by a broken man who took refuge in Grasmere from the world in which he had found no peace; and the characters described as lying in the churchyard among the mountains are almost all of them portraits. The clergyman and his family described in Book VII. were among the poet's principal associates in the vale of Grasmere. "There was much talent in the family," says Wordsworth, in the memoranda dictated to Miss Fenwick; "and the eldest son was distinguished for poetical talent, of which a specimen is given in my Notes to the Sonnets on the Duddon. Once when, in our cottage at Townend, I was talking with him about poetry, in the course of our conversation I presumed to find fault with the versification of Pope, of whom he was an enthusiastic admirer. He defended him with a warmth that indicated much irritation; nevertheless, I could not abandon my point, and said, 'In compass and variety of sound your own versification surpasses his.' Never shall I forget the change in his countenance and tone of voice. The storm was laid in a moment; he no longer disputed my judgment; and I passed immediately in his mind, no doubt, for as great a critic as ever lived."

It was with personages simple and unromantic as these that Wordsworth filled the canvas of his longest poem. Judged by ordinary standards the Excursion appears an epic without action, and with two heroes, the Pastor and the Wanderer, whose characters are identical. Its form is cumbrous in the extreme, and large tracts of it have little claim to the name of poetry. Wordsworth compares the Excursion to a temple of which his smaller poems form subsidiary shrines; but the reader will more often liken the small poems to gems, and the Excursion to the rock from which they were extracted. The long poem contains, indeed, magnificent passages, but as a whole it is a diffused description of scenery which the poet has where caught in brighter glumpses; a diffused state of hopes and beliefs which have crystallized more sitely elsewhere round moments of in paring a The Excursion, in short, has the drawbacks of a poem as compared with lyrical poems; but, judg didactic poem, it has the advantage of containing to frue and permanent value.

I shall not attempt to deduce a settled scheme losophy from these discourses among the mount; would arge only that, as a guide to conduct, Words precepts are not in themselves either unintelligible ionary. For whereas some moralists would have us Nature, and others bid us follow her, there is up something imparationly in the first maxim, and sor vague in the second. Asceticism, quitter, enth eestasy--all systems which imply an unnatural rep or an unnatural excitation of our faculties ware if for the mass of mankind. And on the other han are told to follow nature, to develope our original ter, we are too often in doubt as to which of our o ing instincts to follow, what part of our complex in accept as our regulating self. But Wordsworth, wi pressing on us conformity to unture as the rule suggests a test of such conformity which can be pe "The child is father of the man" words which stand as introduction to his postical and Wordsworth holds that the instincts and pleas a healthy childhood sufficiently indicate the lines of our maturer character should be formed. The joy began in the mere sense of existence should be mai by hopeful faith; the simplicity which began in it ence should be recovered by meditation; the love originated in the family circle should expand itself over the race of men. And the calming and elevating influence of Nature—which to Wordsworth's memory seemed the inseparable concomitant of childish years—should be constantly invoked throughout life to keep the heart fresh and the eyes open to the mysteries discernible through her radiant veil. In a word, the family affections, if duly fostered, the influences of Nature, if duly sought, with some knowledge of the best books, are material enough to "build up our moral being" and to outweigh the less deep-seated impulses which prompt to wrong-doing.

If, then, surrounding influences make so decisive a difference in man's moral lot, what are we to say of those who never have the chance of receiving those influences aright; who are reared, with little parental supervision, in smoky cities, and spend their lives in confined and monotonous labour? One of the most impressive passages in the Excursion is an indignant complaint of the injustice thus done to the factory child. Wordsworth was no fanatical opponent of manufacturing industry. He had intimate friends among manufacturers; and in one of his letters he speaks of promising himself much pleasure from witnessing the increased regard for the welfare of factory hands of which one of these friends had set the example. But he never lost sight of the fact that the life of the mill-hand is an anomaly—is a life not in the order of nature, and which requires to be justified by manifest necessity and by continuous care. The question to what extent we may acquiesce in the continuance of a low order of human beings, existing for our enjoyment rather than for their own, may be answered with plausibility in very different tones; from the Communist who cannot acquiesce in the inferiority of any one man's position to any other's, to the philo opher who holds that mankind has a most eminent progress when a few chosen individuate been supported in easy brilliancy by a population or slaves. Wordsworth's answer to this questionec conservative and philanthropic. He holds to tinction of classes, and thus admits a difference in ness and value of human lots. But he will not come any social arrangement which implies a necessare inferiority in any section of the body politic; esteems it the statesman's first duty to provide citizens shall be placed under conditions of life however humble, shall not be unfavourable to virtage.

His views on national education, which at first: pear so inconsistent, depend on the same concenational welfare. Wordsworth was one of the ear most emphatic proclaimers of the duty of the Stat respect. The lines in which he insists that eve ought to be taught to read are, indeed, often quot example of the moralising baldness of much of l verse. But, on the other hand, when a great imp given to education (1820-20) by Bell and Lanc. the introduction of what was called the "Madras of tuition by pupil-teachers, and the spread of schools, Wordsworth was found unexpectedly in posite camp. Considering as he did all mental ments as entirely subsidiary to moral progress themselves of very little value, he objected to a which, instead of confining itself to reading the pensable channel of moral nutriment-simed at c cating knowledge as varied and advanced as time a would allow. He objected to the dissociation of and home life-to that relegation of domestic inter duties to the background, which large and highly a schools, and teachers much above the home level, must necessarily involve. And yet more strongly, and as it may still seem to many minds, with convincing reason, he objected to an eleemosynary system, which "precludes the poor mother from the strongest motive human nature can be actuated by for industry, for forethought, and selfdenial." "The Spartan," he said, "and other ancient communities, might disregard domestic ties, because they had the substitution of country, which we cannot have. Our course is to supplant domestic attachments, without the possibility of substituting others more capacious. What can grow out of it but selfishness?" The half-century which has elapsed since Wordsworth wrote these words has evidently altered the state of the question. It has impressed on us the paramount necessity of national education, for reasons political and social too well known to repeat. But it may be feared that it has also shifted the incidence of Wordsworth's arguments in a more sinister manner, by vastly increasing the number of those homes where domestic influence of the kind which the poet saw around him at Rydal is altogether wanting, and school is the best avenue even to moral well-being. "Heaven and hell," he writes in 1808, "are scarcely more different from each other than Sheffield and Manchester, &c., differ from the plains and valleys of Surrey, Essex, Cumberland, or Westmoreland." It is to be feared, indeed, that even "the plains and valleys of Surrey and Essex" contain many cottages whose spiritual and sanitary conditions fall far short of the poet's ideal. But it is of course in the great and growing centres of population that the dangers which he dreads have come upon us in their most aggravated form. And so long as there are in England so many homes to which parental care and the influences of nature are alike unknown, no protest in favour of the paramount importance of these primary agencies in the formation of character can be regarded as altogether out of date.

With such severe and almost presaic themes is the greater part of the Excursion occupied. Yet the poem is far from being composed throughout in a pressic spirit, "Of its bones is coral made;" its arguments and theories have Jain long in Wordsworth's mind, and have accreted to themselves a rich investiture of observation and feeling. Some of its passages rank among the poet's highest flights, Such is the passage in Book I, describing the boy's rapture at sunrise; and the picture of a sunset at the close of the same book. Such is the opening of Book IV.; and the passage describing the wild joy of rouning through a mountain storm; and the metaphor in the same book which compares the mind's power of transfiguritys the obstacles which beset her, with the glory into which the moon incorporates the umbrage that would intercept her honns

It would scarcely be possible at the present day that a work containing such striking passages, and so much of substance and elevation—however out of keeping it might be with the ruling taste of the day—hould appear without receiving careful study from many quarters and warm appreciation in some recognized organs of opinion. Criticism in Wordsworth's day was both less competent and loss conscientious, and the famous "this will never do" of Jeffrey in the Edinburgh Review was by no means an extreme specimen of the general tone in which the work was received. The judgment of the reviewers influenced popular taste; and the book was as decided a pecuniary failure as Wordsworth's previous ventures had been.

And here, perhaps, is a fit occasion to speak of that strangely violent detraction and abuse which formed so large an ingredient in Wordsworth's life—or, rather, of that which is the only element of permanent interest in such a matter—his manner of receiving and replying to it. No writer, probably, who has afterwards achieved a reputation at all like Wordsworth's, has been so long represented by reviewers as purely ridiculous. And in Wordsworth's manner of acceptance of this fact we may discern all the strength, and something of the stiffness, of his nature; we may recognize an almost, but not quite, ideal attitude under the shafts of unmerited obloquy. For he who thus is arrogantly censured should remember both the dignity and the frailty of man; he should wholly forgive, and almost wholly forget; but, nevertheless, should retain such serviceable hints as almost any criticism, however harsh or reckless, can afford, and go on his way with no bitter broodings, but yet (to use Wordsworth's expression in another context) "with a melancholy in the soul, a sinking inward into ourselves from thought to thought, a steady remonstrance, and a high resolve."

How far his own self-assertion may becomingly be carried in reply, is another and a delicate question. There is almost necessarily something distasteful to us not only in self-praise but even in a thorough self-appreciation. We desire of the ideal character that his faculties of admiration should be, as it were, absorbed in an eager perception of the merits of others—that a kind of shrinking delicacy should prevent him from appraising his own achievements with a similar care. Often, indeed, there is something most winning in a touch of humorous blindness: "Well, Miss Sophia, and how do you like the Lady of the Lake?" "Oh, I've not read it; papa says there's nothing so bad for young people as reading bad poetry."

But there are circumstances under which this graceful absence of self-consciousness can no longer be maintained. When a man believes that he has a message to deliver that vitally concerns mankind, and when that message is received with contempt and apathy, he is now with drive en back upon himself; he is forced to consider whether what he has to say is after all so important, and whether his mode of saying it be right and adequate. A necessity of this kind was forced upon both Shelley and Wordsworth. Shelley-the very type of self-forgetful enthusiasm-was driven at last by the world's treatment of him into a series of moods sometimes bitter and sometimes self-distristful-into a sense of aloofness and detachment from the mass of men, which the poet who would fain improve and exalt them should do his utmost not to feel. On Wordsworth's more stubborn nature the effect produced by many years of detraction was of a different kind, Naturally introspective, he was driven by abuse and ridicule into taking stock of himself more frequently and more laboriously than ever. He formed an estimate of himself and his writings which was, on the whole (as will now be generally admitted), a just one; and this view he expressed when occasion offered -in soler language, indeed, but with calm conviction, and with precisely the same air of speaking from undoubted knowledge as when he described the beauty of Cumbrian mountains or the virtue of Cumbrian homes.

"It is impossible," he wrote to Lady Beaumont in 1807, "that any expectations can be lower than mine concerning the immediate effect of this little work upon what is called the public. I do not here take into consideration the envy and malevolence, and all the bad passions which always stand in the way of a work of any merit from a living poet; but merely think of the pure, absolute, honest ignorance in which all worldlings, of every rank and situation, must be enveloped, with respect to the thoughts, feelings, and images on which the life of my poems depends. The things which I have taken, whether from within or without, what have they to do with routs, dinners, morning calls, hurry from door to door, from street to street, on foot or in carriage; with Mr. Pitt or Mr. Fox, Mr. Paul or Sir Francis Burdett, the Westminster election or the borough of Honiton? In a word -for I cannot stop to make my way through the hurry of images that present themselves to me-what have they to do with endless talking about things that nobody cares anything for, except as far as their own vanity is concerned, and this with persons they care nothing for, but as their vanity or selfishness is concerned? What have they to do (to say all at once) with a life without love? In such a life there can be no thought; for we have no thought (save thoughts of pain), but as far as we have love and admiration.

"It is an awful truth, that there neither is nor can be any genuine enjoyment of poetry among nineteen out of twenty of those persons who live, or wish to live, in the broad light of the world—among those who either are, or are striving to make themselves, people of consideration in society. This is a truth, and an awful one; because to be incapable of a feeling of poetry, in my sense of the word, is to be without love of human nature and reverence for God.

"Upon this I shall insist elsewhere; at present let me confine myself to my object, which is to make you, my dear friend, as easy-hearted as myself with respect poems. Trouble not yourself upon their present tion. Of what moment is that compared with trust is their destiny?—to console the afflicted; sunshine to daylight, by making the happy happ teach the young and the gracious of every age to think, and feel, and therefore to become more and securely virtuous; this is their office, which they will faithfully perform long after we (that is, is mortal of us) are mouldered in our graves."

Such words as these come with dignity from the of a man like Wordsworth when he has been, as driven to bay-when he is consoling an intimate distressed at the torrent of ridicule which, as she must sweep his self-confidence and his purposes aw may be permitted to assure her that "my ears are dead to this idle buzz, and my flesh as insensible to these petty stings," and to accompany his as with a reasoned statement of the grounds of his us hopes.

We feel, however, that such an expression of ance on the part of a great man should be according with some proof that no conceit or impatience as with his steadfast calm. If he believes the publically unable to appreciate himself, he must show prise when they admire his inferiors; he must rethat the case would be far worse if they admired at all. Nor must he descend from his own on merits on the plea that after catching the public a by what is bad he will retain it for what is good is so sure that he is in the right he can afford to what he world come round to him. Wordsworth's satisfies both these tests. It is, indeed, curious to how much abuse this inoffensive recluse received, and how absolutely he avoided returning it. Byron, for instance, must have seemed in his eyes guilty of something far more injurious to mankind than "a drowsy, frowsy poem, called the Excursion," could possibly appear. But, except in one or two private letters, Wordsworth has never alluded to Byron at all. Shelley's lampoon—a singular instance of the random blows of a noble spirit, striking at what, if better understood, it would eagerly have revered — Wordsworth seems never to have read. Nor did the violent attacks of the Edinburgh and the Quarterly Reviews provoke him to any rejoinder. To "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" - leagued against him as their common prey-he opposed a dignified silence; and the only moral injury which he derived from their assaults lay in that sense of the absence of trustworthy external criticism which led him to treat everything which he had once written down as if it were a special revelation, and to insist with equal earnestness on his most trifling as on his most important pieces-on Goody Blake and The Idiot Boy as on The Cuckoo or The Daffodils. The sense of humour is apt to be the first grace which is lost under persecution; and much of Wordsworth's heaviness and stiff exposition of commonplaces is to be traced to a feeling which he could scarcely avoid, that "all day long he had lifted up his voice to a perverse and gainsaying generation."

To the pecuniary loss inflicted on him by these adverse criticisms he was justly sensible. He was far from expecting, or even desiring, to be widely popular or to make a rapid fortune; but he felt that the labourer was worthy of his hire, and that the devotion of years to literature should have been met with some moderate degree of the usual form of recognition which the world those who work for it. In 1820 he speaks of "of my returns from the writing trade not amoseven-score pounds;" and as late as 1843, wheight of his fame, he was not ashamed of the importance which he had always attached t ticular.

"So sensible am I," he says, "of the deficier that I write, and so far does everything that I as short of what I wish it to be, that even privation, if such a term may be allowed, requires me tion than I can command. I have written to go my own mind, and not without hope that, some other, kindred minds might benefit by my labor am inclined to believe I should never have vessend forth any verses of mine to the world, if it been done on the pressure of personal occasion been a rich man, my productions, like this A Tragedy of the Borderers, &c., would most likely confined to manuscript."

An interesting passage from an unpublished Miss Wordsworth's, on the White Doe of Ryl firms this statement:

"My brother was very much pleased with your franking us that you did not perfectly like his poem. He wis what your feelings were—whether the tale itself did not—or whether you could not enter into the conception character, or take delight in that visionary communic supposed to have existed between her and the Doc. Do give him pain. He is far too much accustomed to be all ceive pain from it (at least as far as he himself is concertain for asking you these questions is, that some of who are equal admirers of the White Doc and of my brolished poems, think that this poem will sell on account of

that is, that the story will bear up those points which are above the level of the public taste; whereas, the two last volumes—except by a few solitary individuals, who are passionately devoted to my brother's works—are abused by wholesale.

"Now, as his sole object in publishing this poem at present would be for the sake of the money, he would not publish it if he did not think, from the several judgments of his friends, that it would be likely to have a sale. He has no pleasure in publishing—he even detests it; and if it were not that he is not over-wealthy, he would leave all his works to be published after his death. William himself is sure that the White Doe will not sell or be admired, except by a very few, at first; and only yields to Mary's entreaties and mine. We are determined, however, if we are deceived this time, to let him have his own way in future."

These passages must be taken, no doubt, as representing one aspect only of the poet's impulses in the matter. With his deep conviction of the world's real, though unrecognized, need of a pure vein of poetry, we can hardly imagine him as permanently satisfied to defer his own contribution till after his death. Yet we may certainly believe that the need of money helped him to overcome much diffidence as to publication; and we may discern something dignified in his frank avowal of this when it is taken in connexion with his scrupulous abstinence from any attempt to win the suffrages of the multitude by means unworthy of his high vocation. He could never, indeed, have written poems which could have vied in immediate popularity with those of Byron or Scott. But the criticisms on the first edition of the Lyrical Ballads must have shown him that a slight alteration of methodnay, even the excision of a few pages in each volume, pages certain to be loudly objected to-would have made a marked difference in the sale and its proceeds. From this point of view, even poems which we may now feel to have been needlessly puerile and grotesque acquire a certain impressiveness, when we recognize that the theory which demanded their composition was one which their author was willing to uphold at the cost of some years of real physical privation, and of the postponement for a generation of his legitimate fame.

CHAPTER IX.

POETIC DICTION.—" LAODAMIA."—" EVENING ODE."

THE Excursion appeared in 1814, and in the course of the next year Wordsworth republished his minor poems, so arranged as to indicate the faculty of the mind which he considered to have been predominant in the composition of each. To most readers this disposition has always seemed somewhat arbitrary; and it was once suggested to Wordsworth that a chronological arrangement would be better. The manner in which Wordsworth met this proposal indicated the limit of his absorption in himselfhis real desire only to dwell on his own feelings in such a way as might make them useful to others. For he rejected the plan as too egoistical—as emphasizing the succession of moods in the poet's mind, rather than the lessons which those moods could teach. His objection points, at any rate, to a real danger which any man's simplicity of character incurs by dwelling too attentively on the changing phases of his own thought. But after the writer's death the historical spirit will demand that poems, like other artistic products, should be disposed for the most part in the order of time.

In a preface to this edition of 1815, and a supplementary essay, he developed the theory on poetry already set forth in a well-known preface to the second edition of the Lyrical Ballads. Much of the matter of these exceived at the time with contemptuous aversion, is cepted as truth; and few compositions of equal lens tain so much of vigorous criticism and sound re It is only when they generalize too confidently the are in danger of misleading us; for all exposition art and practice of poetry must necessarily be ince Poetry, like all the arts, is essentially a "myster charm depends upon qualities which we can neithe accurately, nor reduce to rule, nor create again at ; Mankind, however, are unwilling to admit this; a endeavour from time to time to persuade themsel they have discovered the rules which will enable produce the desired effect. And so much of the ef thus be reproduced, that it is often possible to bel a time that the problem has been solved. Pope, the instance which was prominent in Wordsworth' was by general admission a poet. But his supress to depend on imitable peculiarities; and Pope's in were so like Pope that it was hard to draw a line where they ceased to be poets. At last, however, itative school began to prove too much. If all the verses which they wrote were poetry, what was the writing poetry at all? A reaction succeeded, wh serted that poetry depends on emotion, and not on that it consists precisely in those things which fri itators lack. Cowper, Burne, and Crabbe (e-perial) Sir Eustace Grey) had preceded Wordsworth as les this reaction. But they had acted half unconsciohad even at times themselves attempted to copy t style which they were smarredime.

Wordsworth, too, began with a tendency to Pope, but only in the school exercises which he w a boy. Poetry soon became to him the expression of his own deep and simple feelings; and then he rebelled against rhetoric and unreality, and found for himself a directer and truer voice. "I have proposed to myself to imitate and, as far as is possible, to adopt the very language of men.... I have taken as much pains to avoid what is usually called poetic diction as others ordinarily take to produce it." And he erected this practice into a general principle in the following passage:

"I do not doubt that it may be safely affirmed that there neither is, nor can be, any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition. We are fond of tracing the resemblance between poetry and painting, and accordingly we call them sisters; but where shall we find bonds of connexion sufficiently strict to typify the affinity between metrical and prose composition? If it be affirmed that rhyme and metrical arrangement of themselves constitute a distinction which overturns what I have been saying on the strict affinity of metrical language with that of prose, and paves the way for other artificial distinctions which the mind voluntarily admits, I answer that the language of such poetry as I am recommending is, as far as is possible, a selection of the language really spoken by men: that this selection, wherever it is made with true taste and feeling, will of itself form a distinction far greater than would at first be imagined, and will entirely separate the composition from the vulgarity and meanness of ordinary life; and if metre be superadded thereto. I believe that a dissimilitude will be produced altogether sufficient for the gratification of a rational mind. What other distinction would we have? whence is it to come? and where is it to exist?"

There is a definiteness and simplicity about this description of poetry which may well make us wonder why this precious thing (producible, apparently, as easily as Pope's imitators supposed, although by means different from theirs) is not offered to us by more persons, and of better quality. And it will not be hard to show that a good poetical style must possess certain characteristics. which, although something like them must exist in a good prose style, are carried in poetry to a pitch so much higher as virtually to need a specific faculty for their successful production.

To illustrate the inade-prop of Wordsworth's theory to explain the merits of his own poetry, I select a stanza from one of his simplest and most characteristic poems, The Affliction of Margaret:

"Perhaps some dangeon bears their grean, Mained, mangled by inhuman men, Or thou upon a Descrit thrown Inheritest the lion's Den; Or hast been summoned to the Deep, Thou, thou and all thy mates, to keep An incommunicable sleep."

These lines, supposed to be uttered by "a poor widow at Penrith," afford a fair illustration of what Wordsworth calls "the language really spoken by men," with " ricetre superadded." "What other distinction from presse," he asks, "would we have?" We may answer that we would have what he has actually given us, viz., an Apareterizate and attractive music, lying both in the rhythm and in the actual sound of the words used -a music whose corresplexity may be indicated here by drawing out some of its clements in detail, at the risk of app alter pedantic and technical. We observe, then (a), that the general movement of the lines is unusually slow. They contain a very large proportion of strong accents and long vowels, to strit the tone of deep and de pairie, sorrow, In six places only out of twenty-eight is the accent weak where it might be expected to be strong (in the second syllable, receively, of the iambic foot), and in each of these cases the ormission of a possible accent throws greater weight on the next succeeding accent—on the accents, that is to say, contained in the words inhuman, desert, lion, summoned, deep, and sleep. (b) The first four lines contain subtle alliterations of the letters d, h, m, and th. In this connexion it should be remembered that when consonants are thus repeated at the beginning of syllables, those syllables need not be at the beginning of words; and further, that repetitions scarcely more numerous than chance alone would have occasioned may be so placed by the poet as to produce a strongly-felt effect. If any one doubts the effectiveness of the unobvious alliterations here insisted on, let him read (1) "jungle" for "desert,"

(2) "maybe" for "perhaps," (3) "tortured" for "mangled," (4) "blown" for "thrown," and he will become sensible of the lack of the metrical support which the existing consonants give one another. The three last lines contain one or two similar alliterations on which I need not dwell. (c) The words inheritest and summoned are by no means such as "a poor widow," even at Penrith, would employ; they are used to intensify the imagined relation which connects the missing man with (1) the wild beasts who surround him, and (2) the invisible Power which leads; so that something mysterious and awful is added to his fate. (d) This impression is heightened by the use of the word incommunicable in an unusual sense, "incapable of being communicated with," instead of "incapable of being communicated;" while (e) the expression "to keep an incommunicable sleep" for "to lie dead," gives dignity to the occasion by carrying the mind back along a train of literary associations of which the well-known ατέρμονα νήγρετον υπνον of Moschus may be taken as the type.

H.

We must not, of course, suppose that Wordswor sciously sought these alliterations, arranged these resolved to introduce an unusual word in the last hunted for a classical allusion. But what the poet does not do consciously it does unconsciously; a saction is going on in its recesses simultaneously wovert train of thought, and on the degree of this scious suggestiveness the richness and includy of t try will depend.

No rules can secure the attainment of these effect the very same artifices which are delichtful when a one man seem mechanical and offensive when a another. Nor is it by any means always the ca the man who can most delicately appreciate the of the poetry of others will be able to produce simil ody himself. Nay, even if he can produce it one by no means follows that he will be able to prothe next. Of all qualifications for writing poetry ventive music is the most arbitrarily distributed, r most evanescent. But it is the more important to on its necessity, inasmuch as both good and bad pe tempted to ignore it. The good poet prefers to his success to higher qualities; to his inorgination tion of thought, descriptive faculty. The lad pe more easily urge that his thoughts are too advanmankind to appreciate than that his melody is too for their ears to catch. And when the gift vanis poet is willing to confess that it is gone; so hum is it to lose power ever mankind by the lose of non which seems quite independent of intellect or chi And yet so it is. For some twenty years at most 1818) Wordsworth possessed this gift of melody. those years he wrote works which profoundly infl ind. The gift then left him; he continued as wise as earnest as ever, but his poems had no longer any cy, nor his existence much public importance.

miliating as such reflections may seem, they are in dance with actual experience in all branches of art. act is that the pleasures which art gives us are comin the extreme. We are always disposed to dwell ich of their elements as are explicable, and can in way be traced to moral or intellectual sources. But contain also other elements which are inexplicable, noral, and non-intellectual, and which render most of ttempted explanations of artistic merit so incomplete be practically misleading. Among such incomplete nations Wordsworth's essays must certainly be ranked. uld not be safe for any man to believe that he had ced true poetry because he had fulfilled the condiwhich Wordsworth lavs down. But the essays efl what is perhaps as much as the writer on art can hope to accomplish. They placed in a striking that side of the subject which had been too long ed; they aided in recalling an art which had beconventional and fantastic into the normal current glish thought and speech.

may be added that, both in doctrine and practice, sworth exhibits a progressive reaction from the exviews with which he starts towards that common of good sense and sound judgment which may be back to Horace, Longinus, and Aristotle. His first se is violently polemic. He attacks with reason that ption of the sublime and beautiful which is reprebly Dryden's picture of "Cortes alone in his night" remarking that "the mountains seem to nod their y heads." But the only example of true poetry which he sees fit to addree in contrast consists in from the Balax in the Wood. In his preface of is not less severe on false sentiment and false ober But his views of the complexity and dignity of have been much developed, and he is willing now his favourable instances from Shakspeare, Milton and himself.

His own practice underwent a corresponding. It is only to a few poems of his earlier years that mous parody of the Rejected Addresses fairly appli

"My father's walls are made of brick,
But not so tall and not so thick
As these; and goodness me!
My father's beams are made of wood,
But never, never half so good
As those that now I are!"

Lines something like these might have occurred Thorn or The Idiot Boy. Nothing could be more of from the style of the somets, or of the Ode to Dut Laodamia. And yet both the simplicity of the ear the pomp of the later poems were almost always nor is the transition from the one style to the other plexing or abnormal thing. For all sincere styles agruous to one another, whether they be adorned to all high natures are congruous to one another, whether garb of peasant or of prince. What is income aboth is affectation, vulgarity, egoism; and while the style can be interchangeably childlike or magnificent theme requires, the ignoble can neither simplify its purity nor deck itself into grandear.

It need not, therefore, surprise us to find the models becoming more and more dominant in worth's mind, till the poet of Poor Susan and The Cuckoo spends months over the attempt to translate the Æneid—to win the secret of that style which he placed at the head of all poetic styles, and of those verses which "wind," as he says, "with the majesty of the Conscript Fathers entering the Senate-house in solemn procession," and envelope in their imperial melancholy all the sorrows and the fates of man.

And, indeed, so tranquil and uniform was the life which we are now retracing, and at the same time so receptive of any noble influence which opportunity might bring, that a real epoch is marked in Wordsworth's poetical career by the mere rereading of some Latin authors in 1814–16 with a view to preparing his eldest son for the University. Among the poets whom he thus studied was one in whom he might seem to discern his own spirit endowed with grander proportions, and meditating on sadder fates. Among the poets of the battlefield, of the study, of the boudoir, he encountered the first Priest of Nature, the first poet in Europe who had deliberately shunned the life of courts and cities for the mere joy in Nature's presence, for "sweet Parthenope and the fields beside Vesevus' hill."

There are, indeed, passages in the Georgics so Wordsworthian, as we now call it, in tone, that it is hard to realize what centuries separated them from the Sonnet to Lady Beaumont or from Ruth. Such, for instance, is the picture of the Corycian old man, who had made himself independent of the seasons by his gardening skill, so that "when gloomy winter was still rending the stones with frost, still curbing with ice the rivers' onward flow, he even then was plucking the soft hyacinth's bloom, and chid the tardy summer and delaying airs of spring." Such, again, is the passage where the port breaks from the glories of successful industry into the delight of watching the great processes which nature accomplishes untutored and alone, "the joy of gazing on Cytorus waving with boxwood, and on forests of Narycian pine, on tracts that never felt the harrow, nor knew the care of man."

Such thoughts as these the Roman and the English poet had in common - the heritage of untarnished souls.

> "Lacked; 'twas whispered. The device To each and all might well belong: It is the Spirit of Paradise. That prompts such work, a Spirit strong, That gives to all the self same bent. Where life is wise and innocent."

It is not only in tenderness but in dignity that the "wise and innocent" are wont to be at one. Strong in tranquillity, they can intervene amid great emotions with a master's voice, and project on the storm of passion the clear light of their unchanging calm. And thus it was that the study of Virgil, and open light of Virgil's solemn picture of the Underworld, prompted in Wordsworth's mind the most majestic of his poems, his one great uttersuce on heroic love.

He had as yet written little on any such topic as this. At Goslar he had composed the poems on Lucy to which allusion has already been made. And after his happy marriage he had painted in one of the best known of his poems the sweet transitions of wedded love, as it moves on from the first shock and agitation of the encounter of predestined souls through all tendernesses of intimate affection into a pervading permanency and salm. Scattered, moreover, throughout his poems are several passages in which the passion is treated with similar force and truth. The poem which begins "Tis said that some have died for love" depicts the enduring poignancy of bereavement with an "iron pathos" that is almost too strong for art. And something of the same power of clinging attachment is shown in the sonnet where the poet is stung with the thought that "even for the least division of an hour" he has taken pleasure in the life around him, without the accustomed tacit reference to one who has passed away. There is a brighter touch of constancy in that other sonnet where, after letting his fancy play over a glad imaginary past, he turns to his wife, ashamed that even in so vague a vision he could have shaped for himself a solitary joy:

"Let her be comprehended in the frame Of these illusions, or they please no more."

In later years the two sonnets on his wife's picture set on that love the consecration of faithful age; and there are those who can recall his look as he gazed on the picture and tried to recognize in that aged face the Beloved who to him was ever young and fair—a look as of one dwelling in life-long affections with the unquestioning single-heartedness of a child.

And here it might have been thought that as his experience ended, his power of description would have ended too. But it was not so. Under the powerful stimulus of the sixth  $\mathcal{E}neid$ —allusions to which pervade  $Laodamia^1$  throughout—with unusual labour, and by a strenuous effort of the imagination, Wordsworth was enabled to depict his own love in excelsis, to imagine what aspect it might have worn, if it had been its destiny to deny itself at some heroic call, and to confront with nobleness an extreme emergency, and to be victor (as Plato has it) in an Olympian contest of the soul. For, indeed, the "fervent, not ungovernable, love," which is the ideal that Protesilans is sent to teach, is on a great scale the same affection which we have been con idering in domesticity and peace; it is love considered not as a revolution but as a consummation; as a self-abandonment not to a laxer but to a sterner law; no longer as an invasive passion, but as the deliberate habit of the soul. It is that conception of love which springs into being in the last cauto of Dante's Puryatory—which finds in English chivalry a noble voice—

&lt;sup>1</sup> Laodamia should be read (as it is given in Mr. Matthew Arnold's admirable volume of selections) with the earlier conclusion: the second form is less satisfactory; and the third, with its sermonizing tone, "thus all in vain exhorted and reproved," is worst of all.

<sup>a</sup> I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honour more.<sup>a</sup>

For, indeed (even as Plato says that Beauty is the splendour of Truth), so such a Love as this is the splendour of Virtue; it is the unexpected spark that flashes from selfforgetful soul to soul, it is man's standing evidence that he "must lose himself to find himself," and that only when the veil of his personality has lifted from around him can be recognize that he is already in heaven.

In a second poem inspired by this revived study of classical antiquity Wordsworth has traced the career of Dion the worthy pupil of Plato, the philo-sphic ruler of Syracuse, who allowed himself to shed blood unjustly, though for the public good, and was haunted by a spectre symbolical of this fatal error. At last Dion was assassinated, and the words in which the poet tells his fate seem to me to breathe the very triumph of philosophy, to paint with a touch the greatness of a spirit which makes of Death himself a deliverer, and has its strength in the unseen—

"So were the hopeless troubles, that involved The soul of Dion, instantly dissolved."

I can only compare these lines to that famous passage of Sophocles where the lamentations of the dying Œdipus are interrupted by the impatient summons of an unseen accompanying god. In both places the effect is the same—to present to us with striking brevity the contrast between the visible and the invisible presences that may stand about a man's last hour; for he may feel with the desolate Œdipus that "all I am has perished"—he may sink like Dion through inextricable sadness to a disastrous death, and then in a moment the transitory shall disappear and the essential shall be made plain, and from Dion's upright spirit the perplexities shall vanish away, and Œdipus, in the welcome of that unknown companionship, shall find his expiations over and his reward begun.

It is true, no doubt, that when Wordsworth wrote these poems he had lost something of the young inimitable charm which fills such pieces as the Fountain or the Solitary Reaper. His language is majestic, but it is no longer magical. And yet we cannot but feel that he has put into these poems something which he could not have put into the poems which preceded them; that they bear the impress of a soul which has added moral effort to poetic inspiration, and is mistress now of the acquired as well as of the innate virtue. For it is words like these that are the strength and stay of men; nor can their accent of lofty earnestness be simulated by the writer's art. Literary skill may deceive the reader who seeks a literary pleasure alone; and he to whom these strong consolations are a mere imaginative luxury may be uncertain or indifferent out of what heart they come. But those who need them know; spirits that hunger after righteonsness discern their proper food; there is no fear lest they confound the sentimental and superficial with those weighty utterances of moral truth which are the most precious legacy that a man can leave to mankind.

Thus far, then, I must hold that, although much of grace had already vanished, there was on the whole a progress and elevation in the mind of him of whom we treat. But the culminating point is here. After this—whatever ripening process may have been at work unseen—what is chiefly visible is the slow stiffening of the imaginative power, the slow withdrawal of the insight into the soul of things, and a descript in $\frac{\partial \text{the phi} \text{\text{the phi}} \text{\text{the phi}} \text{\text{the phi}} \text{\text{the cuthanasy of a death that was like sleep.}

The impressor produced by Wordsworth's reperusal of Virgil in 1814-16 was a deep and lasting one. In 1829-30 he devoted much time and labour to a translation of the first three books of the **Enrid*, and it is interesting to note the gradual modification of his views as to the true method of rendering poetry.

"I have long been persuaded," he writes to Lord Lonsdale in 1829, "that Milton formed his blank verse upon the model of the Georgies and the "Encid, and I am so much struck with this re-emblaces, that I should have attempted Virgil in blank verse, had I not been persuaded that no ancient author can with advantage be so rendered. Their religion, their warfare, their course of action and feeling are too remote from modern interest to allow it. We require every possible help and attraction of sound in our language to smooth the way for the admission of things so remote from our present concerns. My own notion of translation is, that it cannot be too literal, provided these faults be avoided: baldness, in which I include all that takes from dignity; and strangeness, or uncouthness, including harshness; and lastly, attempts to convey meanings which, as they cannot be given but by languid circumlocutions, cannot in fact be said to be given at all.... I feel it, however, to be too probable that my translation is deficient in ornament, because I must unavoidably have lost many of Virgil's, and have never without reluctance attempted a compensation of my own."

The truth of this last self-criticism is very apparent from the fragments of the translation which were published in the Philological Museum; and Coleridge, to whom the whole manuscript was submitted, justly complains of finding "page after page without a single brilliant note;" and adds, "Finally, my conviction is that you undertake an impossibility, and that there is no medium between a pure version and one on the avowed principle of compensation in the widest sense, i.e., manner, genius, total effect; I confine myself to Virgil when I say this." And it appears that Wordsworth himself came round to this view, for, in reluctantly sending a specimen of his work to the Philological Museum in 1832, he says:

"Having been displeased in modern translations with the additions of incongruous matter, I began to translate with a resolve to keep clear of that fault by adding nothing; but I became convinced that a spirited translation can scarcely be accomplished in the English language without admitting a principle of compensation."

There is a curious analogy between the experiences of Cowper and Wordsworth in the way of translation. Wordsworth's translation of Virgil was prompted by the same kind of reaction against the reckless laxity of Dryden as that which inspired Cowper against the distorting artificiality of Pope. In each case the new translator cared more for his author, and took a much higher view of a translator's duty, than his predecessor had done. But in each case the plain and accurate translation was a failure. while the loose and ornate one continued to be admired We need not conclude from this that the wilful inneeds racy of Pope or Dryden would be any longer excusable in such a work. But, on the other hand, we may certainly feel that nothing is gained by rendering an ancient poet into verse at all unless that verse be of a quality to give a pleasure independent of the faithfulness of the translation which it conveys.

The translations and Landamia are not the only indications of the influence which Virgil exercised over Wordsworth. Whether from mere similarity of feeling, or from more or less conscious recollection, there are frequent pussages in the English which recall the Roman poet. Who can hear Wordsworth describe how a poet on the island in Grasmere " At moon Spreads out his limbs, while, yet unshorn, the sheep, Panting beneath the burthen of their wood, Lie round him, even as if they were a part Of his own household "- and not think of the stately tenderness of Virgil's

"Stant et oven circum; nostri nec pernitet illas," and the flocks of Aready that gather round in sympathy with the lovelorn Gallus' woe?

So, again, the well-known lines-

"Not seldom, clad in radiant vest, Deceitfully goes forth the Morn; Not seldom Evening in the west Sinks smilingly forsworn "- are almost a translation of Palinurus' remonstrance with "the treachery of tranquil heaven." And when the poet wishes for any link which could bind him closer to the Highland maiden who has flitted across his path as a being of a different world from his own—

"Thine elder Brother would I be, Thy Father, anything to thee!"— we hear the echo of the sadder plaint-

"Atque utinam e vobis unus"- when the Roman statesman longs to be made one with the simple life of shepherd or husbandman, and to know their undistracted joy.

Still more impressive is the shock of surprise with which we read in Wordsworth's poem on Ossian the following lines:

> "Museus, stationed with his lyre Supreme among the Elysian quire, Is, for the dwellers upon earth, Mute as a lark ere morning's birth."

and perceive that he who wrote them has entered—where no commentator could conduct him—into the solemn pathos of Virgil's Musaum ante omnis; where the singer whose very existence upon earth has become a legend and a mythic name is seen keeping in the underworld his old pre-eminence, and towering above the blessed dead.

This is a stage in Wordsworth's career on which his biographer is tempted unduly to linger. For we have reached the Indian summer of his genius; it can still shine at moments bright as ever, and with even a new majesty and calm; but we feel, nevertheless, that the melody is dying from his song; that he is hardening into self-repetition, into rhetoric, into sermonizing common-place, and is rigid where he was once profound. The Thanks-giving Ode (1816) strikes death to the heart. The accustomed patriotic sentiments—the accustomed virtuous aspirations—these are still there; but the accent is like that of a ghost who calls to us in hollow mimicry of a voice that once we loved.

And yet Wordsworth's poetic life was not to close without a great symbolical spectacle, a solemn farewell. Sunset among the Cumbrian hills, often of remarkable beauty, once or twice, perhaps, in a score of years, reaches a pitch of illusion and magnificence which indeed seems nothing less than the commingling of earth and heaven. Such a sight seem from Rydal Mount in 1818 safforded once more the needed stimulus, and evoked that "Evening Ode, composed on an evening of extraordinary splendour and beauty," which is the last considerable production of Wordsworth's genius. In this ode we recognize the peculiar gift of reproducing with magical simplicity, as it were, the inmost virtue of natural phenomena.

"No sound is uttered, but a deep
And solemn harmony pervades
The hollow vale from steep to steep,
And penetrates the glades.
Far distant images draw nigh,
Called forth by wondrous potency
Of beamy radiance, that imbues
Whate'er it strikes, with gem-like hues?
In vision exqui in by clear
Herds range along the mountain side;
And glistening antiers are descried,
And glided flocks appear."

Once more the poet brings home to us that sense of belonging at once to two worlds, which gives to human life so much of mysterious solemnity.

"Wings at my shoulder seem to play;
But, rooted here, I stand and gaze
On those bright steps that heavenward raise Their practicable way."

And the poem ends—with a deep personal pathos—in an allusion, repeated from the Ode on Immortality, to the light which "lay about him in his infancy"—the light

"Full early lost, and fruitlessly deplored;
Which at this moment, on my waking sight
Appears to shine, by miracle restored!
My soul, though yet confined to earth,
Rejoices in a second birth;
—'Tis past, the visionary splendour fades;
And night approaches with her shades."

For those to whom the mission of Wordsworth appears before all things as a religious one there is something solemn in the spectacle of the seer standing at the close of his own apocalypse, with the consciousness that the stiffening brain would never permit him to drink again that overflowing sense of glory and revelation—never, till he should drink it new in the kingdom of God. He lived, in fact, through another generation of men, but the vision came to him no more;

"Or if some vestige of those gleams Survived, 'twas only in his dreams."

We look on a man's life for the most part as forming in itself a completed drama. We love to see the interest maintained to the close, the pathos deepened at the departing hour. To die on the same day is the prayer of lovers; to vanish at Trafalgar is the ideal of heroic souls. And yet—so wide and various are the issues of life—there is a solemnity as profound in a quite different lot; for if we are moving among eternal emotions we have time to bear withe a that they are eternal. Love left devolate may feel with a proud tramaph. could never have rooted itself to immutable amid the of a visible return as it can do through the con tass bereavement, and the life long memory which is a life hope. And Vision, Revelation, Lestary at it no while these are kindling our way that we hould apthem to men, but rather when they have parcel fr and left us only their record in our couls, who are nence confirm, the fiery finger which wrote it lon For as the Greeks would end the fir t drama of a with a hush of concentration, and with declining no calm, so to us the narrowing receptivity and per steadfastness of age angivet and only docay but a aney, and not death no much as hept or even were, the beginning of operations which are not me by our hurrying time, nor to ted by any achieven be accomplished here.

1.

CHAPTER X.

NATURAL RELIGION.

It will have been obvious from the preceding pages, as well as from the tone of other criticisms on Wordsworth, that his exponents are not content to treat his poems on nature simply as graceful descriptive pieces, but speak of him in terms usually reserved for the originators of some great religious movement. "The very image of Wordsworth," says De Quincey, for instance, "as I prefigured it to my own planet-struck eye, crushed my faculties as before Elijah or St. Paul." How was it that poems so simple in outward form that the reviewers of the day classed them with the Song of Sixpence, or at best with the Babes in the Wood, could affect a critic like De Quincey—I do not say with admiration, but with this exceptional sense of revelation and awe?

The explanation of this anomaly lies, as is well known, in something new and individual in the way in which Wordsworth regarded nature; something more or less discernible in most of his works, and redeeming even some of the slightest of them from insignificance, while conferring on the more serious and sustained pieces an importance of a different order from that which attaches to even the most brilliant productions of his contemporaries. To define with exactness, however, what was this new element imported by our poet into man's view of nature is far from easy, and requires some brief consideration of the attitude in this respect of his predecessors.

I 6* 2:

There is a much in the external world which is terrible or unfriendly to man, that the first impression made on him by Nature as a whole, even in temperate climates, is usually that of awfulness; his admiration being reserved for the fragments of her which he has utilized for his own purposes, or adorned with his own handiwork. When Homer tells us of a place it is of no prospect of sea or mountain that he is speaking, but of a garden where constition is planted in rows, and there is a mover reling succession of pears and figs. These gentler aspects of nature will have their minor deities to represent them; but the men, of whatever race they be, whose minds are most absorbed in the problems of man's position and destiny will tend for the most part to some sterner and more on much be a conception of the sum of things. "Lord, what is man, that then art mindful of him?" is the cry of Hebrew piety as well as of modern science; and the "majestas cognita rerum"—the recognized majesty of the universe—teaches furcetius only the indifference of gods and the misery of men.

"Where even a god might gase, and stand apart, And feel a wondering rapture at the heart,"

But in a well-known passage, in which Lucretius is honoured as he deserves, we find, nevertheless, a different view hinted, with an impressiveness which it had hardly acquired till then. We find Virgil implying that scientific knowledge of Nature may not be the only way of arriving at the truth about her; that her loveliness is also a revelation, and that the soul which is in unison with her ified by its own peace. This is the very substance a Poet's Epitaph also; of the poem in which Wordsat the beginning of his career describes himself as atinued till its close—the poet who "murmurs near unning brooks a music sweeter than their own"—corns the man of science "who would peep and ze upon his mother's grave."

"The outward shows of sky and earth,
Of hill and valley, he has viewed;
And impulses of deeper birth
Have come to him in solitude.

"In common things that round us lie
Some random truths he can impart—
The harvest of a quiet eye
That broods and sleeps on his own heart.

"But he is weak, both man and boy,

Hath been an idler in the land;

Contented if he might enjoy

The things which others understand."

e much else in the literature of imperial Rome, the se in the second Georgic, to which I have referred, its essence more modern than the Middle Ages. Wal Christianity involved a divorce from the nature diss, as well as from the nature within. With the the modern spirit delight in the external world reand from Chaucer downwards through the whole of English poetry are scattered indications of a which draws from visible things an intuition of not seen. When Withers, in words which Wordshas fondly quoted, says of his muse:

"By the murmur of a spring, Or the least bough's rustelling; By a daisy whose haver spread, Shut when Titan good to bed ; Or a chady hash or tree of the could more infascin me. Than all Nature's he who count to some other water near?

he felt already, as Wordsworth after him, that Nature mere collection of phenomena, but infuses into he approaches some sense of her mysterious whole.

Passages like this, however, must not be too a pressed. The invotic element in English literatu run for the most part into other channels; and wh ter Pope's reign of artificially and convention, att was redirected to the phaseance, of Nature by C Beattie, Thomson, Crabbe, Cowper, Burns, and Sc was in a spirit of admiring observation rather th an intimate worship. Sometimes, as for the most p Thomson, we have mere perform in the contributed of Nature for the mere pleasure of reproducing h kind of stock-taking of her habitual effects. Or times, as in Barns, we have a glowing spirit which on Nature with a side glance, and uses her as an acc to the expression of human love and was. Cowper times contemplated her as a whole, but only as aff a proof of the wisdom and goodness of a personal C

To express what is characteristic in Wordswood must recur to a more controlled conception of the tions between the natural and the spiritual worlds must say with Plato—the lawgiver of all subseque alists—that the unknown realities around us, who philosopher apprehends by the contemplation of a truth, become in various ways obscurely paragramen under the influence of "divine madness"—

enthusiasm which is in fact inspiration. And further, giving, as he so often does, a half fanciful expression to a substance of deep meaning, Plato distinguishes four kinds of this enthusiasm. There is the prophet's glow of revelation; and the prevailing prayer which averts the wrath of heaven; and that philosophy which enters, so to say, unawares into the poet through his art, and into the lover through his love. Each of these stimuli may so exalt the inward faculties as to make a man eroleog sal έκφρων—" bereft of reason, but filled with divinity "--percipient of an intelligence other and larger than his own. To this list Wordsworth has made an important addition. He has shown by his example and writings that the contemplation of Nature may become a stimulus as inspiring as these; may enable us "to see into the life of things" -as far, perhaps, as beatific vision or prophetic rapture can attain. Assertions so impulpable as these must justify themselves by subjective evidence. He who claims to give a message must satisfy us that he has himself received it; and, inasmuch as transcendent things are in themselves inexpressible, he must convey to us in hints and figures the conviction which we need. Prayer may bring the spiritual world near to us; but when the eyes of the kneeling Dominic seem to say "Io son venuto a questo," their look must persuade us that the life of worship has indeed attained the reward of vision. Art, too, may be inspired; but the artist, in whatever field he works, must have "such a mastery of his mystery" that the fabric of his imagination stands visible in its own light before our eyes-

> "Seeing it is built Of music; therefore never built at all, And therefore built for ever."

Love may open heaven; but when the lover would us "thither, where are the eyes of Beatrice," he mus us feel that his individual passion is indeed part as cel of that love "which moves the sun and the other

And so also with Wordsworth. Unless the words describe the intense and sympathetic gaze with which contemplates Nature convince us of the reality of light which never was on sen or land "—of the "P which disturbs him with the joy of clevated thoug of the authentic vision of those hours

"When the light of sense Goes out, but with a flash that has revealed. The invisible world;"

unless his tone awakes a responsive conviction i selves, there is no argument by which he can prove that he is offering a new insight to mankind. the other hand, it need not be unreasonable to see message something more than a mere individual It seems, at least, to be closely correlated with the er messages of which we have spoken those other where some original element of our nature is capbeing regarded as an inlet of mystic truth. For i of these complex aspects of religion we see, perha modification of a primeval instinct. There is a pe view from which Revelation seems to be but trans Sorcery, and Love transfigured Appetite, and Phile man's ordered Wonder, and Prayer his softening And similarly, in the natural religion of Wordswo may discern the modified outcome of other hum pulses hardly less universal-of those instincts wh our forefathers to people earth and air with deities vivify the whole universe with a single soul. In th the achievement of Wordsworth was of a kind which most of the moral leaders of the race have in some way or other performed. It was that he turned a theology back again into a religion; that he revived in a higher and purer form those primitive elements of reverence for Nature's powers which had diffused themselves into speculation, or crystallized into mythology; that for a system of beliefs about Nature, which paganism had allowed to become grotesque -of rites which had become unmeaning-he substituted an admiration for Nature so constant, an understanding of her so subtle, a sympathy so profound, that they became a veritable worship. Such worship, I repeat, is not what we commonly imply either by paganism or by panthe-ism. For in pagan countries, though the gods may have originally represented natural forces, yet the conception of them soon becomes anthropomorphic, and they are reverenced as transcendent men; and, on the other hand, pantheism is generally characterized by an indifference to things in the concrete, to Nature in detail; so that the Whole, or Universe, with which the Stoics (for instance) sought to be in harmony, was approached not by contemplating external objects, but rather by ignoring them.

Yet here I would be understood to speak only in the most general manner. So congruous in all ages are the aspirations and the hopes of men that it would be rash indeed to attempt to assign the moment when any spiritual truth rises for the first time on human consciousness. But thus much, I think, may be fairly said, that the maxims of Wordsworth's form of natural religion were uttered before Wordsworth only in the sense in which the maxims of Christianity were uttered before Christ. To compare small things with great—or, rather, to compare great things with things vastly greater—the essential spirit of the Lines near Tintern Abbey was for practical purposes as new to mankind as the essential spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. Not the isolated expression of moral ideas, but their fusion into a whole in one memorable personality, is that which connects them forever with a single name. Therefore it is that Wordsworth is venerated; because to so many men—indifferent, it may be, to literary or poetical effects, as such—he has shown by the subtle intensity of his own emotion how the contemplation of Nature can be made a revealing agency, like Love or Prayer—an opening, if indeed there be any opening, into the transcendent world.

The prophet with such a message as this will, of course, appeal for the most part to the experience of exceptional moments—those moments when "we see into the life of things;" when the face of Nature sends to us "gleams like the flashing of a shield"—hours such as those of the Solitary, who, gazing on the lovely distant scene,

"Would gaze till it became Far lovelier, and his heart could not sustain The beauty, still more beauteous."

But the idealist, of whatever school, is seldom content to base his appeal to us upon these scattered intuitions alone. There is a whole epoch of our existence whose memories, differing, indeed, immensely in vividness and importance in the minds of different men, are yet sufficiently common to all men to form a favourite basis for philosophical argument. "The child is father of the man;" and through the recollection and observation of early childhood we may hope to trace our ancestry—in heaven above or on the earth beneath—in its most significant manifestation.

It is to the workings of the mind of the child that the philosopher appeals who wishes to prove that knowledge is recollection, and that our recognition of geometrical truths—so prompt as to appear instinctive—depends on our having been actually familiar with them in an earlier world. The Christian mystic invokes with equal confidence his own memories of a state which seemed as yet to know no sin:

" Happy those early days, when I Shined in my angel infancy! Before I understood this place Appointed for my second race. Or taught my soul to fancy aught But a white, celestial thought: When yet I had not walked above A mile or two from my first Love. And, looking back at that short space, Could see a glimpse of His bright face: When on some gilded cloud or flower My gazing soul would dwell an hour, And in those weaker glories spy Some shadows of eternity; Before I taught my tongue to wound My conscience with a sinful sound, Or had the black art to dispense A several sin to every sense, But felt through all this fleshly dress Bright shoots of everlastingness."

And Wordsworth, whose recollections were exceptionally vivid, and whose introspection was exceptionally penetrating, has drawn from his own childish memories philosophical lessons which are hard to disentangle in a logical statement, but which will roughly admit of being classed under two heads. For, firstly, he has shown an unusual delicacy of analysis in eliciting the "firstborn affinities that fit our new existence to existing things"—in tracing the first impact of impressions which are destined to give the mind its earliest ply, or even, in unreflecting natures, to determine the permanent modes of thought. And, secondly, from the halo of pure and vivid emotions with which our childish years are surrounded, and the close connexion of this emotion with external nature, which it glorifies and transforms, he infers that the soul has enjoyed elsewhere an existence superior to that of earth, but an existence of which external nature retains for a time the power of reminding her.

The first of these lines of thought may be illustrated by a passage in the Prelude, in which the boy's mind is represented as passing through precisely the train of emotion which we may imagine to be at the root of the theology of many barbarous peoples. He is rowing at night alone on Esthwaite Lake, his eyes fixed upon a ridge of crags, above which nothing is visible:

"I dipped my oars into the silent lake, And as I rose upon the stroke my boat Went heaving through the water like a swan; When, from behind that craggy steep till then The horizon's bound, a huge peak, black and huge, As if with voluntary power instinct Upreared its head. I struck and struck again; And, growing still in stature, the grim shape Towered up between me and the stars, and still, For so it seemed, with purpose of its own, And measured motion like a living thing, Strode after me. With trembling oars I turned, And through the silent water stole my way Back to the covert of the willow-tree; There in her mooring-place I left my bark, And through the meadows homeward went, in grave And serious mood. But after I had seen at spectacle, for many days, my brain rked with a dim and undetermined sense unknown modes of being; o'er my thoughts are hung a darkness—call it solitude, clank desertion. No familiar shapes nained, no pleasant images of trees, sea, or sky, no colours of green fields; huge and mighty forms, that do not live e living men, moved slowly thro' the mind day, and were a trouble to my dreams."

ontroversy as to the origin of the worship of objects, or of the powers of Nature, this passage y be cited as an example of the manner in which its, or those powers, can impress the mind with which is the foundation of savage creeds, while re not identified with any human intelligence, a spirits of ancestors or the like, nor even supperate according to any human analogy.

is point Wordsworth's reminiscences may seem llustrate the conclusions which science reaches ads. But he is not content with merely recordalyzing his childish impressions; he implies, or s, that these "fancies from afar are brought" aild's view of the world reveals to him truths man with difficulty retains or recovers. This is al teaching of science, yet it would be hard to it is absolutely impossible. The child's instincts be supposed to partake in larger measure of the tincts of the race, in smaller measure of the incts of his own country and century, than is ith the man. Now the feelings and beliefs of ssive century will probably be, on the whole, those of any previous century. But this is sally true; the teaching of each generation does not thus sum up the results of the whole past. And thus the child, to whom in a certain sense the past of humanity is present—who is living through the whole life of the race in little, before he lives the life of his century in large—may possibly dimly apprehend something more of truth in certain directions than is visible to the adults around him.

But, thus qualified, the intuitions of infancy might seem scarcely worth insisting on. And Wordsworth, as is well known, has followed Plato in advancing for the child a much bolder claim. The child's soul, in this view, has existed before it entered the body-has existed in a world superior to ours, but connected, by the immunionce of the same pervading Spirit, with the material universe before our eyes. The child begins by feeling this material world strange to him. But he sees in it, as it were, what he has been accustomed to see; he discerns in it its kinship with the spiritual world which he dimly remembers; it is to him "an unsubstantial fairy place"-a scene at once brighter and more unreal than it will appear in his eyes when he has become acclimatized to earth. And even when this freshness of insight has passed away, it own ionally happens that sights or sounds of unusual beauty or carrying deep associations—a rainbow, a cuckoo's cay, a sunset of extraordinary splendour will renew for a while this sense of vision and nearness to the spiritual world - a sense which never loses its reality, though with advancing years its presence grows briefer and more rare.

Such then, in prosaic statement, is the most characteristic message of Wordsworth. And it is to be noted that though Wordsworth at times presents it as a coherent theory, yet it is not necessarily of the nature of a theory, nor need be accepted or rejected as a whole; but is rather an inlet of ning emotion in which different minds can share in easure of their capacities or their need. There are to whom childhood brought no strange vision of mess, but who can feel their communion with the ity in Nature growing with the growth of their souls. are others who might be unwilling to acknowledge piritual or transcendent source for the elevating joy the contemplation of Nature can give, but who feel, theless, that to that joy Wordsworth has been their effective guide. A striking illustration of this fact be drawn from the passage in which John Stuart Mill, osepher of a very different school, has recorded the nce exercised over him by Wordsworth's poems, read eason of dejection, when there seemed to be no real abstantive joy in life, nothing but the excitement of ruggle with the hardships and injustices of human hat made Wordsworth's poems a medicine for my state of he says, in his Autobiography, "was that they expressed, not butward beauty, but states of feeling, and of thought coloured ing, under the excitement of beauty. They seemed to be the alture of the feelings which I was in quest of. In them I to draw from a source of inward joy, of sympathetic and imve pleasure, which could be shared in by all human beings, had no connexion with struggle or imperfection, but would be icher by every improvement in the physical or social condition kind. From them I seemed to learn what would be the perenturces of happiness, when all the greater evils of life shall have emoved. And I felt myself at once better and happier as I nder their influence."

ords like these, proceeding from a mind so different the poet's own, form perhaps as satisfactory a testito the value of his work as any writer can obtain: for they imply that Wordsworth has succeeded in giving his own impress to emotions which may become common to all; that he has produced a body of thought which is felt to be both distinctive and coherent, while yet it enlarges the reader's capacities instead of making demands upon his credence. Whether there be theories, they shall pass; whether there be systems, they shall fail; the true epoch-maker in the history of the human soul is the man who educes from this bewildering universe a new and elevating joy.

I have alluded above to some of the passages, most of them familiar enough, in which Wordsworth's sense of the mystic relation between the world without us and the world within—the correspondence between the seen and the unseen—is expressed in its most general terms. But it is evident that such a conviction as this, if it contain any truth, cannot be barren of consequences on any level of thought. The communion with Nature which is capable of being at times sublimed to an incommunicable ecstasy must be capable also of explaining Nature to us so far as she can be explained; there must be axiomata media of natural religion; there must be something in the nature of poetic truths, standing midway between mystic intuition and delicate observation.

How rich Wordsworth is in these poetic truths—how illumining is the gaze which he turns on the commonest phenomena—how subtly and variously he shows us the soul's innate perceptions or inherited memories, as it were, co-operating with Nature and "half creating" the voice with which she speaks—all this can be learnt by attentive study alone. Only a few scattered samples can be given here; and I will begin with one on whose significance the poet has himself dwelt. This is the poem called The Leech-Gatherer, afterwards more formally named Resolution and Independence.

"I will explain to you," says Wordsworth, "in prose, my feelings in writing that poem. I describe myself as having been exalted to the highest pitch of delight by the joyousness and beauty of Nature; and then as depressed, even in the midst of those beautiful objects, to the lowest dejection and despair. A young poet in the midst of the happiness of Nature is described as overwhelmed by the thoughts of the miserable reverses which have befallen the happiest of all men, viz., poets. I think of this till I am so deeply impressed with it, that I consider the manner in which I am rescued from my dejection and despair almost as an interposition of Providence. A person reading the poem with feelings like mine will have been awed and controlled, expecting something spiritual or supernatural. What is brought forward! A lonely place, 'a pond, by which an old man was, far from all house or home:' not stood, nor sat, but was-the figure presented in the most naked simplicity possible. The feeling of spirituality or supernaturalness is again referred to as being strong in my mind in this passage. How came he here? thought I, or what can he be doing? I then describe him, whether ill or well is not for me to judge with perfect confidence; but this I can confidently affirm, that though I believe God has given me a strong imagination, I cannot conceive a figure more impressive than that of an old man like this, the survivor of a wife and ten children, travelling alone among the mountains and all lonely places, carrying with him his own fortitude, and the necessities which an unjust state of society has laid upon him. You speak of his speech as tedious. Everything is tedious when one does not read with the feelings of the author. The Thorn is tedious to hundreds; and so is The Idiot Boy to hundreds. It is in the character of the old man to tell his story, which an impatient reader must feel tedious. But, good heavens I such a figure, in such a place; a pious, wif respecting, miserably infirm and pleased old man, telling such a tale!"

The näive earnestness of this passage suggests to us how constantly recurrent in Wordsworth's mind were the two trains of ideas which form the substance of the poem; the interaction, namely (if so it may be termed), of the moods of Nature with the moods of the human mind; and the dignity and interest of man as man, depicted with no complex background of social or political life, but set amid the primary affections and sorrows, and the wild aspects of the external world.

Among the pictures which Wordsworth has left us of the influence of Nature on human character, Peter Bell may be taken as marking one end, and the poems on Lucy the other end of the scale. Peter Bell lives in the face of Nature untouched alike by her terror and her charm; Lucy's whole being is moulded by Nature's self; she is responsive to sun and shadow, to silence and to sound. and melts almost into an impersonation of a Cumbrian valley's peace. Between these two extremes how many are the possible shades of feeling! In Ruth, for instance, the point impressed upon us is that Nature's influence is only salutary so long as she is herself, so to say, in keeping with man; that when her op maken reach that degree of habitual energy and splendour at which our love for her passes into fascination and our admiration into bewilderment, then the fierce and irregular stimulus consorts no longer with the growth of a temperate virtue:

> "The wind, the tempest rearing high, The tumult of a tropic sky, Might well be dangerous food For him, a youth to whom was given So much of earth, so much of heaven, And such impetuous blood."

a contrasting touch recalls the healing power of e gentle and familiar presences which came to Ruth er stormy madness with visitations of momentary

"Yet sometimes milder hours she knew,
Nor wanted sun, nor rain, nor dew,
Nor pastimes of the May;
They all were with her in her cell;
And a wild brook with cheerful knell
Did o'er the pebbles play."

will give one other instance of this subtle method of ng with the contrasts in nature. It is from the poem led "Lines left upon a Seat in a Yew-Tree which is near the Lake of Esthwaite, on a desolate part of Shore, commanding a beautiful Prospect." This seat once the haunt of a lonely, a disappointed, an emred man.

"Stranger! these gloomy boughs
Had charms for him; and here he loved to sit,
His only visitants a straggling sheep,
The stone-chat, or the glancing sand-piper;
And on these barren rocks, with fern and heath
And juniper and thistle sprinkled o'er,
Fixing his downcast eye, he many an hour
A morbid pleasure nourished, tracing here
An emblem of his own unfruitful life;
And, lifting up his head, he then would gaze
On the more distant scene—how lovely 'tis Thou seest—and he would gaze till it became Far lovelier, and his heart could not contain
The beauty, still more beauteous! Nor, that time,

When Nature had subduced him to herself, Would be forget those beings, to whose minds, Warm from the labours of benevolence. The world, and human life, appeared a scene of kindred loveliness; then he would sigh With mournful joy, to think that others felt What he must never feel; and so, lost Man! On visionary views would fancy feed Till his eyes streamed with tears.

This is one of the passages which the lover of Wordsworth quotes, perhaps, with some apprehension; not knowing how far it carries into the hearts of others its affecting power; how vividly it calls up before them that mood of desolate loneliness when the whole vision of human love and joy hangs like a mirage in the air, and only when it seems irrecoverably distant seems also intolerably dear. But, however this particular passage may impress the reader, it is not hard to illustrate by abundant references the potent originality of Wordsworth's outlook on the external world.

There was indeed no aspect of nature, however often depicted, in which his seeing eye could not discern some unnoted quality; there was no mood to which nature gave birth in the mind of man from which his meditation could not discrete some element which threw light on our inner being. How often has the approach of evening been described! and how mysterious is its solemnising power! Yet it was reserved for Wordsworth, in his somet "Hail, Twilight, sovereign of one peaceful hour," to draw out a characteristic of that grey waning light which half explains to us its sombre and percelling charm. "Day's mutable distinctions" pass away; all in the landscape that suggests our own age or our own handiwork is gone; we look on the sight seen by our remote sneeders.

he visible present is generalized into an immeasupast.

e sonnet on the Duddon beginning "What aspect the Man who roved or fled First of his tribe to this dell?" carries back the mind along the same track, the added thought of Nature's permanent gentleness the "hideous usages" of primeval man-through all the stream's voice was innocent, and its flow benign. reight of awe not easy to be borne" fell on the poet, as he looked on the earliest memorials which these e ancestors have left us. The Sonnet on a Stonewhich opens with these words is conceived in a of emotion never more needed than now-when y itself owes its preservation to the munificence of rate individual - when stone-circle or round-tower, or dolmen, are destroyed to save a few shillings, and ation-roads are mended with the immemorial altars unknown God. "Speak, Giant-mother! tell it to forn!"—how strongly does the heart re-echo the solinvocation which calls on those abiding witnesses to once of what they knew long ago! e mention of these ancient worships may lead us to e mention of these ancient worships may lead us to a what manner Wordsworth was affected by the Nateities of Greece and Rome—impersonations which preserved through so many ages so strange a charm. space must be found here for the characteristic sona which the baseness and materialism of modern life is him back on whatsoever of illumination and reality a that young ideal.

"The world is too much with us; late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers; Little we see in Nature that is ours; We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon! The Sea that bares her bosom to the moon;

The Winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up gathered now like sleeping flowers;
For this, for everything we are out of tune;
It moves us not. Great God! I'd rather be
A pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

Wordsworth's own imagination idealized Nature in a different way. The sonnet "Brook! whose society the poet seeks" places him among the men whose Nature-deities have not yet become anthropomorphic—men to whom "unknown modes of being" may seem more lovely as well as more awful than the life we know. He would not give to his idealized brook "human checks, channels for tears—no Naiad shouldst thou be"—

"It seems the Eternal Soul is clothed in thee.
With purer robes than those of flesh and blood,
And hath bestowed on thee a better good;
Unwearied joy, and life without its cares,"

And in the Sounct on Calais Beach the sea is regarded in the same way, with a sympathy (if I may so say) which needs no help from an imaginary impersonation, but strikes back to a sense of kinship which seems antecedent to the origin of man.

"It is a beauteous Evening, calm and free;
The holy time is quiet as a Nun
Breathless with adoration; the broad sun
Is sinking down in its tranquillity;
The gentleness of heaven is on the Sea;
Listen! the mighty Being is awake,
And doth with his eternal motion make
A sound like thunder—everlastingly."

parison, made by Wordsworth himself, of his tod of observing Nature with Scott's expresses in cal language something of what I am endeavour-atiated much to me one day," says Mr. Aubrey de Vere, lked among the hills above Grasmere, on the mode in re had been described by one of the most justly popular 's modern poets-one for whom he preserved a high and respect. 'He took pains,' Wordsworth said; 'he went s pencil and note-book, and jotted down whatever struck -a river rippling over the sands, a ruined tower on a rock promontory, and a mountain-ash waving its red berries. ome and wove the whole together into a poetical descriper a pause, Wordsworth resumed, with a flashing eye and d voice: 'But Nature does not permit an inventory to be r charms! He should have left his pencil and note-book ted his eye as he walked with a reverent attention on all nded him, and taken all into a heart that could undernjoy. Then, after several days had passed by, he should ogated his memory as to the scene. He would have dist, while much of what he had admired was preserved to was also most wisely obliterated; that which remainedsurviving in his mind-would have presented the ideal al truth of the scene, and done so in a large part by disch which, though in itself striking, was not characteristic. ene many of the most brilliant details are but accidental; for Nature does not note them, or at least does not dwell any a phrase of Wordsworth's rises in the mind tion of this power! phrases which embody in a sture, or a single image—it may be the vivid of the flowery coppice, of

"Flaunting summer, when he throws His soul into the briar-rose"— lancholy stillness of the declining year-

"Where float: O'er twilight field: the autumnal go samer;"

or, as in the words which to the sensitive Charles Lamb seemed too terrible for art, the irresponsive blankness of the universes.

"The broad open eye of the colitary sky " -- beneath which mortal hearts must make what merriment they may.

Or take those typical stanzas in Peter Bell, which to long were accounted among Wordsworth's leading abound ities.

> "In vain through every changeful year Did Nature lead him a thefore; A primrote by the river's brim A yellow primrote was to him, And it was nothing more.

"In vain, through water, earth, and air,
The coul of happy cound was spread,
When Peter, on some April morn,
Beneath the broom or budding thorn,
Made the warm earth his lays hed,

"At noon, when by the fore the coles.

He lay beneath the branches high,

The roft blue sky did never nels.

Into his heart—he never felt.

The witchery of the roft blue sky t

"On a fair prospect come have looked And felt, at I have heard them ray, At if the moving time had been A thing at steadfalt at the leans On which they gozed theme-live caway."

In all these passages, it will be observed, the emotion is educed from Nature rather than added to her; he is treated as a mystic text to be deciphered, rather than as a stimulus to roving imagination. This latter mood, indeed, Wordsworth feels occasionally, as in the sonnet where the woodland sights become to him "like a dream of the whole world;" but it is checked by the recurring sense that "it is our business to idealize the real, and not to realize the ideal." Absorbed in admiration of fantastic clouds of sunset, he feels for a moment ashamed to think that they are unrememberable—

"They are of the sky, And from our earthly memory fade away."

But coon he disclaims this regret, and reasserts the paramount interest of the things that we can grasp and love:

"Grove, isle, with every shape of sky-built dome, Though clad in colours beautiful and pure, Find in the heart of man no natural home: The immortal Mind craves objects that endure: These cleave to it; from these it cannot roam, Nor they from it: their fellowship is secure."

From this temper of Wordsworth's mind, it follows that there will be many moods in which we shall not retain him as our companion. Moods which are rebellious, which beat at the bara of fate; moods of passion reckless in its vehemence, and assuming the primacy of all other emotions through the intensity of its delight or pain; moods of more imaginative phantasy, when we would fain shape from the well worn materials of our thought some fabric at once beautiful and new; from all such phases of our inward being Wordsworth stands aloof. His poem on the nightingale and the stock-dove illustrates with half-consenues allegory the contrast between himself and certain other poets.

"O Nightingale! thou surely art
A creature of a fiery heart;
These notes of thine—they pierce and pierce;
Tumultuous harmony and fierce!
Thou sing'st as if the God of wine
Had helped thee to a Valentine;
A song in mockery and despite
Of shades, and dews, and silent Night;
And steady bliss, and all the loves
Now sleeping in their peaceful groves.

"I heard a Stock-dove sing or say
His homely tale, this very day;
His voice was buried among trees,
Yet to be come at by the breeze:
He did not cease; but cooed—and cooed,
And somewhat pensively he wooed.
He sang of love with quiet blending,
Slow to begin, and never ending;
Of serious faith and inward glee;
That was the Song—the Song for me!"

"His voice was buried among trees," says Wordsworth; "a metaphor expressing the love of seclusion by which this bird is marked; and characterizing its note as not partaking of the shrill and the piercing, and therefore more easily deadened by the intervening shade; yet a note so peculiar, and withal so pleasing, that the breeze, gifted with that love of the sound which the poet feels, penetrates the shade in which it is entombed, and conveys it to the ear of the listener."

Wordsworth's poetry on the emotional side (as distinguished from its mystical or its patriotic aspects) could hardly be more exactly described than in the above sentence. For while there are few poems of his which could be read to a mixed audience with the certainty of producing an immediate impression; yet, on the other hand, all the best ones gain in an unusual degree by repeated study; and this is especially the case with those in which some touch of tenderness is enshrined in a scene of beauty, which it seems to interpret, while it is itself exalted by it. Such a poem is Stepping Westward, where the sense of sudden fellowship, and the quaint greeting beneath the glowing sky, seem to link man's momentary wanderings with the cosmic spectacles of heaven. Such are the lines where all the wild romance of Highland scenery, the forlornness of the solitary vales, pours itself through the lips of the maiden singing at her work, "as if her song could have no ending"—

"Alone she cuts and binds the grain, And sings a melancholy strain; O listen! for the Vale profound Is overflowing with the sound."

Such—and with how subtle a difference!—is the Frag-ment in which a "Spirit of noonday" wears on his face the silent joy of Nature in her own recesses, undisturbed by beast, or bird, or man—

"Nor ever was a cloudless sky So steady or so fair."

And such are the poems—We are Seven, The Pet Lamb,1

¹ The Pet Lamb is probably the only poem of Wordsworth's which can be charged with having done moral injury, and that to a single individual alone. "Barbara Lewthwaite," says Wordsworth, in 1843, "was not, in fact, the child whom I had seen and overheard as engaged in the poem. I chose the name for reasons implied in the above" (i. e., an account of her remarkable beauty), "and will here add a caution against the use of names of living persons. Within a few months after the publication of this poem I was much surprised, and more hurt, to find it in a child's school-book, which,

Louisa, The Two April Mornings—in which the beauty of rustic children melts, as it were, into Nature herself, and the

> "Blooming girl whose hair was wet With points of morning dew" becomes the impersonation of the season's early joy. We may apply, indeed, to all these girls Wordsworth's description of leverets playing on a lawn, and call them.

"Separate creatures in their several gifts
Abounding, but so fashioned that in all
That Nature prompts them to display, their looks,
Their starts of motion and their fits of rest,
An undistinguishable style appears
And character of gladness, as if Spring
Lodged in their innocent bosoms, and the spirit
Of the rejoicing Morning were their own."

My limits forbid me to dwell longer on these points. The passages which I have been citing have been for the most part selected as illustrating the novelty and subtlety of Wordsworth's view of nature. But it will now be sufficiently clear how continually a strain of human interest is interwoven with the delight derived from impersonal things.

"Long have I loved what I behold,

The night that calms, the day that cheers:
The common growth of mother earth
Suffice, nes—her tears, her mirth,
Her hundlest mirth and tears."

having been compiled by Lindley Murray, had come into use at Grazmere School, where Barbara was a pupil. And, also, I had the mortification of heaving that she was very vain of being thus distinguished; and in after-life she used to say that she remembered the incident, and what I said to her upon the occasion." poet of the Waggoner—who, himself a habitual leinker, has so glowingly described the glorification the prospect of nature receives in a half-intoxicated amay justly claim that he can enter into all genuine cos, even of an order which he declines for himself, anything that is false or artificial he cannot sympamor with such faults as baseness, cruelty, rancour, seem contrary to human nature itself; but in dealth faults of mere weakness he is far less strait-laced any less virtuous men.

had, in fact, a reverence for human beings as such, enabled him to face even their frailties without ion; and there was something in his own happy tion from such falls which touched him into regarden less fortunate rather with pity than disdain:

"Because the unstained, the clear, the crystalline, Have ever in them something of benign."

comment on Burns's Tam o' Shanter will perhaps the some readers who are accustomed to think of him to his didactic attitude.

If the privilege of poetic genius," he says, "to catch, under restrictions of which, perhaps, at the time of its being exerted dimly conscious, a spirit of pleasure wherever it can be found, calks of nature, and in the business of men. The poet, trustorimary instincts, luxuriates among the felicities of love and its enraptured while he describes the fairer aspects of war, a he shrink from the company of the passion of love, though trate—from convivial pleasures, though intemperate—nor from sence of war, though savage, and recognized as the handmaid lation. Frequently and admirably has Burns given way to apulses of nature, both with reference to himself and in detection of others. Who, but some impenetrable dunce awaminded puritan in works of art, ever read without delight the picture which he has drawn of the convivial exultation of the rustic adventurer. Tam o' Shanter? The poet fears not to tell the reader in the outset that his beto was a desperate and sottish drunkard, whose excesses were as frequent as his opportunities. This reprobate sits down to his cups while the storm is rearing, and heaven and earth are in confusion; the night is driven on by song and tumultuous noise, laughter and jest thicken as the beverage improves upon the palister of jest thicken as the beverage improves upon the palister of jest idelity archly bends to the service of general benevolence, selfishness is not absent, but wearing the mask of social cordiality; and while these various elements of humanity are blended into one proud and happy composition of elated spirits, the anger of the tempest without doors only heightens and acts off the enjoyment within. I pity him who cannot perceive that in all this, though there was no moral purpose, there is a moral effect.

"'Kings may be likest, but Tau was glorious,
O'er a' the illa of life victorious."

What a leason do these words convey of charitable indulgence for the vicious habits of the principal actor in the scene, and of those who resemble him! Men who to the rigidly virtuous are objects almost of loathing, and whom therefore they cannot serve! The poet, penetrating the unsightly and disgusting surfaces of things, has unveiled with exquisite skill the finer ties of imagination and feeling, that often hind these beings to practices productive of so much unhappiness to themselves, and to those whom it is their duty to cherish; and, as far as he puts the reader into possession of this intelligent synapadly, he qualifies him for exercising a salutary influence over the minds of those who are thus deplorably enslaved."

The reverence for man as man, the sympathy for him in his primary relations and his essential being, of which these comments on Tam o' Shanter form so remarkable an example, is a habit of thought too ingrained in all Wordsworth's works to call for specific illustration. The figures of Michael, of Matthew, of the Brothers, of the hero of the Excursion, and even of the Idiot Boy, suggest themselves at once in this connexion. But it should be noted in each case how free is the poet's view from any idealization of the poorer classes as such, from the ascription of imaginary merits to an unknown populace which forms the staple of so much revolutionary eloquence. These poems, while they form the most convincing rebuke to the exclusive pride of the rich and great, are also a stern and strenuous incentive to the obscure and lowly. They are pictures of the poor man's life as it is-pictures as free as Crabbe's from the illusion of sentiment—but in which the delight of mere observation (which in Crabbe predominates) is subordinated to an intense sympathy with all such capacities of nobleness and tenderness as are called out by the stress and pressure of penury or woe. They form for the folk of northern England (as the works of Burns and Scott for the Scottish folk) a gallery of figures that are modelled, as it were, both from without and from within; by one with experience so personal as to keep every sentence vividly accurate, and yet with an insight which could draw from that simple life lessons to itself unknown. We may almost venture to generalize our statement further, and to assert that no writer since Shakspeare has left us so true a picture of the British nation. In Milton, indeed, we have the characteristic English spirit at a whiter glow; but it is the spirit of the scholar only, or of the ruler, not of the peasant, the woman, or the child. Wordsworth gives us that spirit as it is diffused among shepherds and husbandmen-as it exists in obscurity and at peace. And they who know what makes the strength of nations need wish nothing better than that the temper which he saw and honoured among the Cumbrian dales should be the temper of all England, now and for ever.

Our discussion of Wordsworth's form of Natural Religion has led us back by no forced transition to the simple which he described and shared. I return to the stor his later years—if that be called a story which derive interest from incident or passion, and dwells only on slow broodings of a meditative soul.

CHAPTER XI.

ITALIAN TOUR.—ECCLESIASTICAL SONNETS.—POLITICAL VIEWS.—LAUREATESHIP.

Wordsworth was fond of travelling, and indulged this taste whenever he could afford it. Comparing himself and Southey, he says in 1843: "My lamented friend Southey used to say that, had he been a Papist, the course of life which in all probability would have been his was that of a Benedictine monk, in a convent furnished with an inexhaustible library. Books were, in fact, his passion; and wandering, I can with truth affirm, was mine; but this propensity in me was happily counteracted by inability from want of fortune to fulfil my wishes." We find him, however, frequently able to contrive a change of scene. His Swiss tour in 1790, his residence in France in 1791-2, his residence in Germany, 1798-9, have been already touched on. Then came a short visit to France in August, 1802, which produced the sonnets on Westminster Bridge and Calais Beach. The tour in Scotland which was so fertile in poetry took place in 1803. A second tour in Scotland, in 1814, produced the Brownie's Cell and a few other pieces. And in July, 1820, he set out with his wife and sister and two or three other friends for a tour through Switzerland and Italy.

This tour produced a good deal of poetry; and here and there are touches which recall the old inspiration. Such is the comparison of the clouds about the Engelberg to hovering angels; and such the description of the eclipse falling upon the population of statues which throng the pinnacles of Milan Cathedral. But for the most part the poems relating to this tour have an artificial look; the sentiments in the vale of Chamouni seem to have been laboriously summoned for the occasion; and the poet's admiration for the Italian maid and the Helvetian girl is a mere shadow of the old feeling for the Highland girl, to whom, in fact, he seems obliged to recur in order to give reality to his new emotion.

To conclude the subject of Wordsworth's travels, I will mention here that in 1823 he made a tour in Holland, and in 1824 in North Wales, where his sonnet to the torrent at the Devil's Bridge recalls the Swiss scenery seen in his youth with vigour and dignity. In 1828 he made another excursion in Belgium with Coleridge, and in 1829 he visited Ircland with his friend Mr. Marshall. Neither of these tours was productive. In 1831 he paid a visit with his daughter to Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford, before his departure to seek health in Italy. Scott received them cordially, and had strength to take them to the Yarrow. "Of that excursion," says Wordsworth, "the verses Yarrow Revisited are a memorial. On our return in the afternoon we had to cross the Tweed, directly opposite Abbotsford. A rich but sad light, of rather a purple than a golden hue, was spread over the Eildon hills at that moment; and, thinking it probable that it might be the last time Sir Walter would cross the stream (the Tweed), I was not a little moved, and expressed some of my feelings in the sonnet beginning, A trouble not of clouds nor weeping rain. At noon on Thursday we left Abbotsford, and on the morning of that day Sir Walter and I had a serious conversation, tite-à-tète, when he spoke with gratitude of the happy life which, upon the whole, he had led. He had written in my daughter's album, before he came into the breakfast-room that morning, a few stanzas addressed to her; and, while putting the book into her hand, in his own study, standing by his desk, he said to her, in my presence, 'I should not have done anything of this kind but for your father's sake; they are probably the last verses I shall ever write.' They show how much his mind was impaired; not by the strain of thought, but by the execution, some of the lines being imperfect, and one stanza wanting corresponding rhymes. One letter, the initial S, had been omitted in the spelling of his own name."

There was another tour in Scotland in 1833, which produced Memorials of little poetic value. And in 1837 he made a long tour in Italy with Mr. Crabbe Robinson. But the noems which record this tour indicate a mind scarcely any longer susceptible to any vivid stimulus except from accustomed objects and ideas. The Musings near Aquapendente are musings on Scott and Helvellyn; the Pine Tree of Monte Mario is interesting because Sir George Beaumont has saved it from destruction; the Cuckoo at Laverna brings all childhood back into his heart. member perfectly well," says Crabbe Robinson, "that I heard the cuckoo at Laverna twice before he heard it; and that it absolutely fretted him that my ear was first favoured; and that he exclaimed with delight, 'I hear it! I hear This was his last foreign tour; nor, indeed, are these tours very noticeable except as showing that he was not blindly wedded to his own lake scenery; that his admiration could face comparisons, and keep the same vividness when he was fresh from other orders of beauty.

L

The productions of these later years took for the most part a didactic rather than a descriptive form. In the volume entitled Poems chiefly of Early and Later Years, published in 1842, were many hortatory or ecclesiastical pieces of inferior merit, and among them various additions to the Ecclesiastical Sketches, a series of sonnets begun in 1821, but which he continued to enlarge, spending on them much of the energies of his later years. And although it is only in a few instances—as in the de cription of King's College, Cambridge—that these sonnets possess force or charm enough to rank them high as poetry, yet they assume a certain value when we consider not so much their own adequacy as the greater is adequacy of all rival attempts in the same direction.

The Episcopalian Churchman, in this country or in the United States, will certainly nowhere find presented to him in poetical form so dignified and comprehensive a record of the struggles and the glories, of the vicissitudes and the edification, of the great body to which he belongs. Next to the Anglican liturgy, though next at an immense interval, these sonnets may take rank as the authentic exposition of her historic being—an exposition delivered with something of her own unadorned dignity, and in her moderate and tranquil tone.

I would not, however, seem to claim too much. The religion which these later poems of Wordsworth's embody is rather the stately tradition of a great Church than the pangs and aspirations of a holy soul. There is little in them, whether for good or evil, of the stuff of which a Paul, a Francis, a Dominic are made. That fervent emotion—akin to the passion of love rather than to intellectual or moral conviction—finds voice through singers of a very different tone. It is fed by an inward anguish and felicity which, to those who have not felt them, seem as causeless as a lover's moods; by wrestlings not with flesh and blood; by nights of despairing self-abasement; by eestasies of an incommunicable peace. How great the gulf between Wordsworth and George Herbert!—Herbert "offering at heaven, growing and groaning thither"—and Wordsworth, for whom the gentle regret of the lines—

"Me this unchartered freedom tires,

I feel the weight of chance desires"— forms his most characteristic expression of the self-judgment of the solitary soul.

Wordsworth accomplished one reconciliation of great importance to mankind. He showed, as plainly in his way as Socrates had shown it long ago, with what readiness a profoundly original conception of the scheme of things will shape itself into the mould of an established and venerable He united the religion of the philosopher with the religion of the churchman; one rarer thing he could not do: he could not unite the religion of the philosopher with the religion of the saint. It is, indeed, evident that the most inspiring feeling which breathes through Wordsworth's ecclesiastical pieces is not of a doctrinal, not even of a spiritual kind. The ecclesiastical as well as the political sentiments of his later years are prompted mainly by the admiring love with which he regarded the structure of English society—seen as that society was by him in its simplest and most poetic aspect. This concrete attachment to the scenes about him had always formed an important element in his character. Ideal politics, whether in Church or State, had never occupied his mind, which sought rather to find its informing principles embodied in the England of his own day. The sonnet On a Parsonage in Oxfordshire well illustrates the loving minuteness with which he draws out the beauty and fitness of the established scheme of things—the power of English country life to satisfy so many monds of feeling.

The country seat of the English square or nobleman has become—may we not say to one of the world's chosen types of a happy and a stately home. And Wordsworth, especially in his poems which deal with Colcorton, has shown how deeply he felt the sway of such a home's hereditary majesty, its secure and transpilliding charm. Yet there are moods when the heart which deeply feels the inequality of human lots turns towards a humbler idea. There are moments when the broad park, the halls and towers, seem no longer the fitting frame of human or strong, but rather an isolating solitude, an unfeeling triumph over the poor.

In such a mood of mind it will not always satisfy us to dwell, as Wordsworth has so often done, on the virtue and happiness that gather round a cottage hearth which we must, after all, judge by a somewhat less exacting standard. We turn rather to the "refined rusticity" of an English Parsonage home.

"Where holy ground begins, unhallowed ends, Is marked by no distinguishable line; The turf unites, the pathways intertwine" ~ and the clergyman's abode has but so much of dignity as belts the minister of the Church which is the hamlet's centre; enough to suggest the old Athenian boast of beauty without extravagance, and study without effeminacy; enough to show that dwellings where not this life but another is the prevailing thought and care, yet need not lack the graces of culture nor the loves of home.

The sonnet on Seathwaite Chapel, and the life of Robert

Walker, the incumbent of Seathwaite, which is given at length in the notes to the sonnets on the Duddon, afford a still more characteristic instance of the clerical ideal towards which Wordsworth naturally turned. In Robert Walker he had a Cumbrian statesman turned into a practical saint; and he describes him with a gusto in which his laboured sonnets on Laud or on Dissensions are wholly deficient.

It was in social and political matters that the consequences of this idealizing view of the facts around him in Cumberland were most apparent. Take education, for Wordsworth, as has been already stated, was example. one of the earliest and most impressive assertors of the national duty of teaching every English child to read. He insists on this with a prosaic cornestness which places several pages of the Excursion among what may be called the standing bugbears which his poems offer to the inexperienced reader. And yet as soon as, through the exertions of Bell and Lancaster, there seems to be some chance of really educating the poor, Dr. Bell, whom Coleridge fondly imagines as surrounded in heaven by multitudes of grateful angels, is to Wordsworth a name of horror. mistresses trained on his system are called "Dr. Bell's sour-looking teachers in petticoats." And the instruction received in these new-fangled schools is compared to "the training that fits a boxer for victory in the ring." The reason of this apparent inconsistency is not far to seek. Wordsworth's eyes were fixed on the village life around him. Observation of that life impressed on him the imperative necessity of instruction in reading. But it was from a moral rather than an intellectual point of view that he regarded it as needful, and, this opening into the world of ideas once secured, he held that the cultivation of the home affections and home duties was all that was beyond. And thus the Westmoreland dame, "in home seat in the garden, and in winter by the firesid elevated into the unexpected position of the ideal tress of youth.

Conservatism of this kind could provoke nothin sympaths the smile. The case was different when the conservative—even retrogrades tendency showed is subjects on which party for the ran high. A groof the meditative energy of Wordsworth's later ye absorbed by questions towards whose solution he uted no new element, and which filled him with portionate fears. And some injustice has been a his memory by those who have not fully realized a disposing causes which were at work of the timidity and the deep readed attachment to the England we know.

I speak of age, perhaps, somewhat perhaps to be poet's gradually growing conservation culminates opposition to the Catholic Relief Bill before he w years old. But there is nothing to wonder at inthat the mind of a man of broading and solitary should show traces of advaration age earlier than case with statesmen or men of the world, who are to keep themselves constantly alive to the ideas of eration that is rising around them. A deadness impresions, an annilling to to make intellectual in fresh directions, a tendency to travel the same pathway, over and over again, and to wear the prejudice deeper at every step; such traces of age undoubtedly manifested themselves in the way is the poet confronted the great series of changes lie Emancipation, Reform Bill, New Poor Law-o England entered about the year 1829. "My sixty-second year," Wordsworth writes, in 1832, "will soon be completed; and though I have been favoured thus far in health and strength beyond most men of my age, yet I feel its effects upon my spirits; they sink under a pressure of apprehension to which, at an earlier period of my life, they would probably have been superior." To this it must be added that the increasing weakness of the poet's eyes seriously limited his means of information. He had never read much contemporary literature, and he read less than ever now. He had no fresh or comprehensive knowledge of the general condition of the country. and he really believed in the prognostication which was uttered by many also who did not believe in it, that with the Reform Bill the England which he knew and loved would practically disappear. But there was nothing in him of the angry polemic, nothing of the calumnious par-One of the houses where Mr. Wordsworth was most intimate and most welcome was that of a reforming member of Parliament, who was also a manufacturer, thus belonging to the two classes for which the poet had the greatest abhorrence. But the intimacy was never for a moment shaken, and, indeed, in that house Mr. Wordsworth expounded the ruinous tendency of Reform and manufactures with even unusual copiousness, on account of the admiring affection with which he felt himself surrounded. The tone in which he spoke was never such as could give pain or excite antagonism; and-if I may be pardoned for descending to a detail which well illustrates my positionthe only rejoinder which these diatribes provoked was that the poet on his arrival was sometimes decoyed into uttering them to the younger members of the family, whose time was of less value, so as to set his mind free to return to those topics of more permanent interest where his conversation kept to the last all that tenderness, nobility, wisdom, which in that family, as in many others familiar with the celebrated persons of that day, won for him a regard and a reverence such as was accorded to no other man.

CHAP.

To those, indeed, who realized how deeply he felt these changes—how profoundly his notion of national happiness was bound up with a lovely and vanishing ideal—the prominent reflection was that the hopes and principles which maintained through all an underlying hope and trust in the future must have been potent indeed. It was no easy optimism which prompted the lines written in 1807—one of his latest utterances—in which he speaks to himself with strong self judgment and resolute hope. On reading them one shrinks from dwelling longer upon an old man's weakness and a brave man's fears.

"If this great world of joy and pain Revolve in one sure track; If Freedom, set, revive again, And Virtue, flown, come back :--

"Woe to the purblind crew who fill.

The heart with each day's care,
Nor learn, from past and future, skill.

To bear and to forbear."

The poet had also during these years more of private sorrow than his tranquil life had for a long time experienced. In 1832 his sister had a most serious illness, which kept her for many months in a state of great prosetration, and left her, when the physical symptoms abated, with her intellect painfully imperied, and her bright nature permanently overclouded. Coleridge, too, was nearing his end. "He and my beloved sister," writes West worth, in 1832, "are the two beings to whom my intellect is most indebted, and they are now proceeding, as it were, pari passu, along the path of sickness, I will not say towards the grave, but I trust towards a blessed immortality."

In July, 1834, "every mortal power of Coleridge was frozen at its marvellous source." And although the early intimacy had scarcely been maintained—though the "comfortless and hidden well" had, for a time at least, replaced the "living murmuring fount of love" which used to spring beside Wordsworth's door-yet the loss was one which the surviving poet deeply felt. Coloridge was the only contemporary man of letters with whom Wordsworth's connexion had been really close; and when Wordsworth is spoken of as one of a group of poets exemplifying in various ways the influence of the Revolution, it is not always remembered how very little he had to do with the other famous men of his time. Scott and Southey were valued friends, but he thought little of Scott's poetry, and less of Southey's. Byron and Shelley he seems scarcely to have read; and there is nothing to show that he had over heard of Keats. But to Coleridge his mind constantly reverted; he called him "the most wonderful man he had ever known," and he kept him as the ideal auditor of his own poems, long after Coleridge had listened to the Prelude-

"A song divine of high and passionate thoughts
To their own music chanted."

In 1836, moreover, died one for whom Coleridge, as well as Wordsworth, had felt a very high respect and regard—Sarah Hutchinson, Mrs. Wordsworth's sister, and long the inmate of Wordsworth's household. This most valued friend had been another instance of the singular good fortune which attended Wordsworth in his domestic connexions; and when she was laid in Grasmere yard, the stone above her tomb expressed the wish poet and his wife that, even as her remains were I side their dead children's, so their own bodies also be laid by hers.

And now, while the inner circle of friends and r began to pass away, the outer circle of admirers w filly premline. Between the years 1830 and 1840. worth passed from the apostle of a clique into the illustrious man of letters in England. The rapi this change was not due to any remarkable accidto the appearance of any new work of genius. merely an extreme instance of what must alway where an author, running counter to the fashion age, has to create his own public in defiance of tablished critical powers. The disciples whom he round him are for the most part young; the esta authorities are for the most part old; so that by the that the original poet is about sixty years old, mosadmirers will be about forty, and most of his crit be dead. His admirers now become his accredited his works are widely introduced to the public; and are really good his reputation is scenre. In Words case the detractors had been may unly per intent, reaction, when it came, was therefore unusually v it was even somewhat factitions in its extent; ; poems were forced by enthusiasts upon a public was only half ripe for them. After the poet's a temporary counter-reaction accessiss, and his fame now finding its permanent level. Among the indications of growing populatity s

Among the indications of growing perpendictly of publication of an American edition of Words poems in 1837, by Professor Reed, of Philadelphi whom the poet interchanged many letters of interest. "The acknowledgments," he says, in one of these, "which I receive from the vast continent of America are among the most grateful that reach me. What a vast field is there open to the English mind, acting through our noble language! Let us hope that our authors of true genius will not be unconscious of that thought, or inattentive to the duty which it imposes upon them, of doing their utmost to instruct, to purify, and to elevate their readers."

But of all the manifestations of the growing honour in which Wordsworth was held, none was more marked or welcome than the honorary degree of D.C.L. conferred on him by the University of Oxford in the summer of 1839. Keble, as Professor of Poetry, introduced him in words of admiring reverence, and the enthusiasm of the audience was such as had never been evoked in that place before. "except upon the occasions of the visits of the Duke of Wellington." The collocation was an interesting one. The special claim advanced for Wordsworth by Keble in his Latin oration was "that he had shed a celestial light mon the affections, the occupations, the piety of the poor." And to many men besides the author of the Christian Year it seemed that this striking scone was, as it were, another visible triumph of the temper of mind which is of the essence of Christianity; a recognition that one spirit more had become as a little child, and had entered into the kingdom of heaven.

In October, 1842, another token of public respect was bestowed on him in the shape of an annuity of 300L a year from the Civil List for distinguished literary merit. "I need scarcely add," says Sir Robert Peel, in making the offer, "that the acceptance by you of this mark of favour from the Crown, considering the grounds on which it is proposed, will impose no restraint upon your perfect independence, and involve no obligation of a personal nature." In March, 1943, came the death of Southey, and in a few days Wordsworth received a letter from Earl De la Warr, the Lord Chamberlain, offering him, in the most courteous terms, the office of Poet Laureate, which, however, he respectfully declined as imposite a duties "which, far advanced in life as I am, I cannot venture to undertake."

CHAP. VI.

166

This letter brought a reply from the Lord Chamberlain. pressing the office on him again, and a letter from Sir Robert Peel which gave dignified expression to the mational feeling in the matter. "The offer," he says, " was made to you by the Lord Chamberlain, with my entire concurrence, not for the purpose of hispering on you any onerous or disagreeable duties, but in order to pay you that tribute of respect which is justly due to the first of living poets. The Queen entirely approved of the nomination, and there is one unanimous feeling on the part of all who have heard of the proposal (and it is pretty generally known) that there could not be a question about the selection. Do not be deterred by the fear of any oleligations which the appointment may be supposed to imply. I will undertake that you shall have nothing required from you. But as the Queen can select for this honourable appointment no one whose claims for respect and honour, on account of eminence as a poet, can be placed in competition with yours, I trust you will not longer hesitate to accept it."

This letter overcame the aged poet's scraples; and he filled with silent dignity the post of Laureate till, after soven years' space, a worthy successor received

"This laurel greener from the brows Of him that uttered todding have,"

CHAPTER XII.

LETTERS ON THE KENDAL AND WINDERMERE RAILWAY .-

Wordsworth's appointment to the Laureateship was significant in more ways than one. He was so much besides a poet, that his appointment implied something of a national recognition, not only of his past poetical achievements, but of the substantial truth of that body of principles which through many years of neglect and ridicule he had consistently supported. There was, therefore, nothing incongruous in the fact that the only composition of any importance which Wordsworth produced after he became Laurente was in prose-his two letters on the projected Kendal and Windermere railway, 1844. No topic, in fact, could have arisen on which the veteran poet could more fitly speak with whatever authority his official spokesmanship of the nation's higher life could give, for it was a topic with every aspect of which he was familiar; and so far as the extension of railways through the Lake country was defended on grounds of popular benefit (and not merely of commercial advantage) no one, certainly, had shown himself more capable of estimating at their full value such benefits as were here proposed.

The results which follow on a large incursion of visitors into the Lake country may be considered under two heads, as affecting the residents, or as affecting the visitors them-And first us to the residents. Of the wealthier class of these I say nothing, as it will perhaps be thought that their inconvenience is outweighed by the possible profits which the railway may bring to speculators or contractors. But the effect produced on the moorer residents son the peacentry - is a serious matter, and the danger which was distantly foreseen by Wordsworth has since his day assumed grave proportions. And lest the poet's estimate of the simple virtue which is thus jeopardized should be suspected of partiably, it may be allowable to corroborate it by the testimony of an eminent man not a native of the district, though a settler therein in later life, and whose writings, perhaps, have done more than any man's since Wordsworth to increase the sum of human enjoyment derived both from Art and from Nature.

"The Border peasantry of Scotland and England," says Mr. Ruskin," "painted with absolute fidelity by Scott and Wordsworth (for leading types out of this exhaustless portraiture, I may name Daudie Dinmont, and Michael), are hitherto a scarcely injured race; whose strength and virtue yet survive to represent the body and soul of England, before her days of mechanical decreptingle and commercial dishonour. There are men working in my own fields who might have fought with Henry the Fifth at Agincourt, without being discerned from among his knights; I can take my tradesmen's word for a thousand pounds; my garden gate opens on the latch to the public road, by day and night, without fear of any foot entering but my own; and my viril gas to may wander by road or moorland, or through every bosky dell of this wild wood, free as the heather-bees or squirrels. What effect on the character of such a population will be produced by the influx of that of the suburbs of our manufacturing towns there is evidence enough, if the reader cares to ascertain the facts, in every newspaper on his morning table."

A Protest against the Extension of Rushways in the Lake Instrict, -Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., 1876.

There remains the question of how the greatest benefit is to be secured to visitors to the country, quite apart from the welfare of its more permanent inhabitants. At first sight this question seems to present a problem of a well-known order—to find the point of maximum pleasure to mankind in a case where the intensity of the pleasure varies inversely as its extension—where each fresh person who shares it diminishes pro tanto the pleasure of the rest. But, as Wordsworth has pointed out, this is not in reality the question here. To the great mass of cheap excursionists the characteristic scenery of the Lakes is in itself hardly a pleasure at all. The pleasure, indeed, which they derive from contact with Nature is great and important, but it is one which could be offered to them, not only as well but much better, near their own homes.

"It is benignly ordained that green fields, clear blue skies, running streams of pure water, rich groves and woods, orchards, and all the ordinary varieties of rural nature should find an easy way to the affections of all men. But a taste beyond this, however desirable it may be that every one should possess it, is not to be implanted at once; it must be gradually developed both in nations and individuals. Rocks and mountains, torrents and wide-spread waters, and all those features of nature which go to the composition of such scenes as this part of England is distinguished for, cannot, in their finer relations to the luman mind, be comprehended, or even very imperfectly conceived, without processes of culture or opportunities of observation in some degree habitual. In the eye of thousands and tens of thousands, a rich meadow, with fat cattle grazing upon it, or the sight of what they would call a heavy crop of corn, is worth all that the Alparaness in their utmost grandeur and beauty could show to thit is noticeable what trilling conventional prepassessions will mon minds, not only preclude pleasure from the sight of heauty, but will even turn it into an object of disgust. In of a small pleasure ground immediately below my house ritached rock, equally remarkable for the heauty of its form, it oaks that grow out of it, and the flowers and shrubs which "What a nice place would this be," said a Marahester to pointing to the rock, "if that ugly himp were but out of the was little advanced in the pleasure which such objects give are so far from being rare that they may be said fairly to a large majority of mankind. This is the fact, and mond deceiver and the willingly deceived can be offended by stated."

And, since this is so, the true means of raising to the masses consists, as Wordsworth proceeds to out, in giving them—not a few harried glimpses is above their compacte. For, but permanent oppor of learning at leisure the first great lessons which has to teach. Since he wrote thus our towns have their blackness wider still, and the provision of pethe recreation of our urban population has become inguational need. And here, again, the very word tion suggests another unfitness in the Lake counthese purposes. Solitude is as characteristic of the as beauty, and what the mass of manking need for refreshment—most naturally and justly—is not but society.

"The silence that is in the starry sky, The sleep that is among the lonely hills," is to them merely a decided by to be overcome by about in large manes, and by consequently in the vehement hilarity. It would be most unreasonsh to curtail the social expansion of men whose or the most part passed in a monotonous round But is it kinder and wiser—from any point of the railway shareholder's-to allure them into trains by the prestige of a scenery which is to t was to all classes a century or two ago) at best , or to provide them near at hand with their ace for rest and play, not separated from their hours of clamour and crowding, nor broken up precipices, nor drenched with sweeping storm? tionably it is the masses whom we have first to Sooner than that the great mass of the dwellers hould be debarred from the influences of Nature than that they should continue for another cendebarred as now they are—it might be better orian statesmen and shepherds should be turned eepers and touts, and that every poet, artist, England should be driven to seek his solitude th Pole. But it is the mere futility of sentiment that there need be any real collision of interests ere is space enough in England yet for all to enr several manners, if those who have the power re some unpolluted rivers, and some unblighted the health and happiness of the factory-hand, is for their fortunes, and whose degradation is e.

corth, while indicating, with some such reasons, the true method of promoting the education is of men in natural joys, was assuredly not likest that in every class, even the poorest, are found a spirits which some inbred power has attuned the stillness and glory of the hills. In what the stillness are given by the stillness are given by the stillness and glory of the hills.

I CHEAR.

way the interests of such men may best be consulted, he has discussed in the following passage:

"O Nature, a' thy shows un' forms."
To feeling pensivo hearts hac charms!"

172

So exclaimed the Ayrshire plan burns, speaking of ordinary rural nature under the varying influences of the seasons; and the sentiment has found an exho in the besome of thousands in as humble a condition as he himself was when he gave vent to it. But then they were feeling, pensive hearts-men who would be among the first to lament the facility with which they had approached this region, by a sacrifice of so much of its quiet and beauty as, from the intrusion of a railway, would be inseparable. What can, in truth, be more absurd than that either rich or poor should be spared the trouble of travelling by the high roads over so short a space, according to their respective means, if the unavoidable consequence must be a great disturbance of the retirement, and, in many places, a destruction of the beauty, of the country which the parties are come in search of ! Would not this be pretty much like the child's cutting up his dram to learn where the sound came from?"

The truth of these words has become more a plant since Wordsworth's day. The Lake country is now both engirdled and intersected with railways. The point to which even the poorest of genuine lovers of the mountains could desire that his facilities of cheap locomotion should be carried has been not only reached but far a railway earnings at Coniston, or Seascale, or Bowness—at Penrith, of Troutbeck, or Keswick—and to move at eight miles an hour in a coach, or at four miles an hour on foot, while her s that small intervening tract of country, of which mile is a separate gem-when, we may ask, is he to unt? what is he to study? Or is nothing to be exfrom nature but a series of dissolving views? s impossible to feel sanguine as to the future of this ceable national possession. A real delight in sce--apart from the excitements of sport or mountainfor which Scotland and Switzerland are better suitn Cumberland—is still too rare a thing among the ier as among the poorer classes to be able to comith such a power as the Railway Interest. And it is ikely now that the Government of England should th regard to this district as the Government of the d States has acted with regard to the Yosemite and vstone valleys, and guard as a national possession eauty which will become rarer and more precious very generation of men. But it is in any case dethat Wordsworth's unanswered train of reasoning e subject should be kept in view — that it should arly understood that the one argument for making railways through the Lakes is that they may possiy; while it is certain that each railway extension rious to the peasantry of the district, and to all s who really care for its scenery, while conferring nefit on the crowds who are dragged many miles to they do not enjoy, instead of having what they reant secured to them, as it ought to be, at their own s probable that all this will continue to be said in Railways, and mines, and waterworks will have way, till injury has become destruction. The natuactuary of England, the nurse of simple and noble s, "the last region which Astræa touches with flying feet," will be sacrificed—it is scarcely possible to doubt it to the greed of gain. We must seek our consolation in the chought that no outrage on nature is mortal; that the ever platify affections of men create for them else continually some fresh abode, and inspire some new hard eape with a consecrating history, and, as it were, with a liberit cont. Yet it will be long ere round some other labe, apon some other hill, shall cluster memories as pure and high as those which hover still around Rydal and Gra mere, and on He've "pic's windy summit, " and by Glaridding Screes and low Glareoign."

With this last word of protest and warning intered, as it may seem to the reader, with unexpected force and conviction from out of the five publics of a screne old age. Word weath's mission is concluded. The prophers of his bayhood is fulfilled, and the "dear native regions" whence his dawning genius rose have been gilded by the last ray of its declining fire. There remains but the domestic chronicles of a few more years of minghed sadness and peace. And I will first cite a characteristic passage from a letter to his American a respectively. Mr. Reed, describing his presentation as Laurente to the Queen:

"The reception given me by the Queen at her ball was meet gracious. Mrs. Everett, the wife of your Minister, among many others, was a witness to it, without knowing who I was. It moved her to the shedding of tears. This effect was in part produced, I suppose, by American habits of feeling, as pertaining to a republishance a rise, at. To see a gray haired man of except five years of age kneeling down in a large assembly to kiss the hand of a young woman is a right for which institutions a satisfy democratic do not prepare a spectator of either sex, and must naturally place the opinions upon which a republic is ed, and the sentiments which support it, in strong st with a government based and upheld as ours is." the same letter the poet introduces an ominous alto the state of his daughter's health. Dora, his aughter who survived childhood, was the darling of sworth's age. In her wayward gaiety and bright rence there was much to remind him of his sister's ; and his clinging nature wound itself round this ora as tenderly as it had ever done round her who ow only the object of loving compassion and care. 11 Dora Wordsworth married Mr. Quillinan, an exof the Guards, and a man of great literary taste me original power. In 1821 he had settled for a n the vale of Rydal, mainly for the sake of Wordss society; and ever since then he had been an inand valued friend. He had been married before, s wife died in 1822, leaving him two daughters, one om was named from the murmuring Rotha, and was ild of the poet. Shortly after marriage, Dora Quilhealth began to fail. In 1845 the Quillinans went orto in search of health, and returned in 1846, in the hat it was regained. But in July, 1847, Dora Quillied at Rydal, and left her father to mourn for his maining years his "immeasurable loss."

depth and duration of Wordsworth's grief, in such ements as fell to his lot, was such as to make his thankful that his life had, on the whole, been through ways of so profound a peace.

atly, indeed, have they erred who have imagined is cold, or even as by nature tranquil. "What is workings," writes one from Rydal Mount, when not was in his sixty-ninth year—"what strange ags are there in his great mind! How fearfully strong are all his feelings and affections? If his intellect had been less powerful they must have destroyed him long ago," Such, in fact, was the impression which he gave to those who knew him best throughout life. The look of pastantas age, which De Quincey insists on; the furrowed and rugged countenance, the broading intensity of the eye, the bursts of anger at the report of evil doings, the lonely and violent roamings over the mountains—wall told of a strong absorption and a smothered fire. His own description of himself, in his Instation of the Castle of Indolence, unexpected as it is by the ordinary reader, carries for those who knew him the stamp of truth:

"Full many a time, upon a stormy night.

His voice came to us from the neighbouring height:

Off did we see him driving full in view.

At mid day when the sun was shining bright;

What ill was on him, what he had to do,

A mighty wonder leed among our quiet crew.

Ah! piteous sight it was to see this Man
When he came back to us, a withered flower s
Or like a sinful creature, pale and wan
Down would be sit; and without strength or power
Look at the common grass from hour to hour;
And offentimes, how long I fear to say,
Where apple trees in blossom made a bower,
Retired in that sunshing shade be lay.
And, like a naked Indian, slept himself away.

Great wonder to our gentle tribe it was

Whenever from our valley he withdraw;

For happier soul no living creature has

Then he had, being here the long day through

Some thought he was a lover, and did were

Some thought far worse of him, and judged him wrong:

But Verse was what he had been wedded to.

And his own mind did like a tempest strong Come to him thus, and drove the weary wight along."

An excitement which vents itself in bodily exercise earries its own sedative with it. And in comparing Wordsworth's nature with that of other poets whose career has been less placid, we may say that he was perhaps not less excitable than they, but that it was his constant endeavour to avoid all excitement save of the purely poetic kind; and that the outward circumstances of his life-his mediocrity of fortune, happy and early marriage, and absence of striking personal charm-made it easy for him to adhere to a method of life which was, in the truest sense of the term, stoic -stoic alike in its practical abstinences and in its calm and grave ideal. Purely poetic excitement, however, is hard to maintain at a high point; and the description quoted above of the voice which came through the stormy night should be followed by another-by the same candid and self-picturing hand-which represents the same habits in a quieter light.

"Nine tenths of my verses," says the poet, in 1843, "have been murmured out in the open air. One day a stranger, having walked round the garden and grounds of Rydal Mount, asked of one of the female servants, who happened to be at the door, permission to see her master's study. 'This,' said she, leading him forward, 'is my master's library, where he keeps his books, but his study is out-of-doors.' After a long absence from home, it has more than once happened that some one of my cottage neighbours (not of the double-coach-house cottages) has said, 'Well, there he is! we are glad to hear him booing about again.'"

Wordsworth's health, steady and robust for the most part, indicated the same restrained excitability. While he was well able to resist fatigue, expensive to weather, &c., there were, in fact, three things which his position constitution made it difficult for him to do, and 1.2.2.2.2.5 those three things were reading, writing, and the composition of poetry. A frequently recurring inflammation of the eyes, caught of 1.2.2 from expensive to a cold wind when overheated by exercise, but always much aggravated by mental excitement, sometimes prevented his reading for months together. His 1.2.2.5.5 when he attempted to hold the pen are thus described in a published letter to Sir George Beaument (1800):

"I do not know from what cause it is, but during the last three years I have never had a pen in my hand for five minutes before my whole frame becomes a buildle of uncasiness; a par planter starts out all over me, and my chest is oppressed in a manner which I cannot describe." While us to the labour of composition his water says (September, 1800): "He writes with so much feeling and agitation that it brings on a sense of pain and internal weakness about his left side and stemach, which now eften makes it impossible for him to write when he is, in nand and feelings, in such a state that he could do it without difficults."

But turning to the brighter side of things—to the joya rather than the pains of the sensitive body and spirit—we find in Wordsworth's later years much of happiness on which to dwell. The memories which his name recalls are for the most part of thoughtful kindnesses, of simple-hearted joy in feeling himself at last appearance, of simple-hearted joy in feeling himself at last appearance it is a recollection of some London discharges, where youth and beauty surrounded the rugged old man with an eager admiration which fell on no una differ heart. Sometimes it is a story of some assemblage of young and old, rich and poor, from all the neighbouring houses and cottages, at Rydal Mount, to keep the aged poet's birthday with a simple feast and rustic play. Sometimes it is a report of some fireside gathering at Lanerigg or Foxhow, where the old man grew eloquent as he talked of Burns and Coleridge, of Homer and Virgil, of the true aim of poetry and the true happiness of man. Or we are told of some last excursion to well-loved scenes; of holly-trees planted by the poet's hands to stimulate nature's decoration on the eraggy hill.

Such are the memories of those who best remember him. To those who were young children while his last years went by he seemed a kind of mystical embodiment of the lakes and mountains round him—a presence without which they would not be what they were. And now he is gone, and their untouched and early charm is going too.

"Heu, tua nobis Pane simul tecum solatia rapta, Menalca!"

Itydal Mount, of which he had at one time feared to be deprived, was his to the end. He still paced the terrace-walks—but now the flat terrace oftener than the sloping one—whence the eye travels to lake and mountain across a tossing gulf of green. The doves that so long had been wont to answer with murmurs of their own to his "half-formed melodies" still hung in the trees above his pathway; and many who saw him there must have thought of the lines in which his favourite poet congratulates himself that he has not been exiled from his home.

&quot;t'alm as thy sacred streams thy years shall flow; Groves which thy youth has known thine age shall know;

Here, as of old, Hybbean been shall twine. Their many murmur into dreams of thine. Still from the hedge's willow bloom shall come. Through summer silence a shimberous hore. Still from the erag shall bugering winds prodong. The half heard cadence of the weedinan's song, while evermore the doves, thy love and care, Fill the tall clims with sighing in the air."

Yet words like these fail to give the selemnity of his last years—the sense of grave retrospection, of humble self-judgment, of hopeful looking to the end. "It is in deed a deep satisfaction," he writes, near the close of life, "to hope and believe that my poetry will be, while it lasts, a help to the cause of virtue and truth, * \( \frac{1}{2} \) \( \frac{1}{2} \) \( \frac{1}{2} \) among the young. As for myself, it seems now of little moment how long I may be remembered. When a man pushes off in his little boat into the great seas of Infinity and Eternity, it surely signifies little how long he is kept in sight by watchers from the shore."

And again, to an intimate friend, "Worldly minded I am not; on the contrary, my wish to benefit those within my humble sphere stronglism, seemingly in exact proposition my inability to realize those wishes. What I lament most is that the pirituality of my nature does not expand and rise the nearer I approach the grave, as yours does, and as it fares with my beloved partner."

The aged poet might feel the loss of some vividness of emotion, but his thoughts dwelt more and more constantly on the unseen world. One of the images which recurs oftenest to his friends is that of the old man as he would stand against the window of the dining room at Hydal Mount and read the Psalms and Lessons for the day; of the tall bowed figure and the silvery hair; of the deep voice which always faltered when among the prayers he came to the words which give thanks for those "who have departed this life in Thy faith and fear."

There is no need to prolong the narration. As healthy infancy is the same for all, so the old age of all good men brings philosopher and peasant once more together, to meet with the same thoughts the inevitable hour. Whatever the well-fought fight may have been, rest is the same for all.

"Retirement then might hourly look Upon a soothing scene;
Age steal to his allotted nook
Contented and serene;
With heart as calm as lakes that sleep,
In frosty moonlight glistening,
Or mountain torrents, where they creep
Llong a channel smooth and deep,
To their own far-off murmurs listening."

What touch has given to these lines their impress of an unfathomable peace? For there speaks from them a tranquillity which seems to overcome our souls; which makes us feel in the midst of tou and passion that we are disquieting ourselves in vain; that we are travelling to a region where these things shall not be; that "so shall immoderate fear leave us, and inordinate love shall die."

Wordsworth's last days were absolutely tranquil. A cold caught on a Sunday afternoon walk brought on a pleurisy. He lay for some weeks in a state of passive weakness; and at last Mrs. Wordsworth said to him, "William, you are going to Dora." "He made no reply at the time, and the words seem to have passed unheeded; indeed, it was not certain that they had been even heard. More than twenty-four hours afterwards one of his nieces came into his room, and was drawing aside the curtain of his chamber, and then, as if awakening from a quiet sleep, he said, 'Is that Dora?'"

On Thesday, April 23, 1850, as his favourite enchanched struck the hour of noon, his spirit passed away. His body was buried, as he had wished, in Grasmere churchyard. Around him the dalesmen of Grasmere lie beneath the shade of sycamore and yew; and Rotha's nurmur mourns the pausing of that "music sweeter than her own." And surely of him, if of any one, we may think as of a man who was so in accord with nature, so at one with the very soul of things, that there can be no Mansion of the Universe which shall not be to him a home, no Governor who will not accept him among his servants, and satisfy him with love and peace.

THE END.

THE BROWNING LITTERS

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING AND ELIZABETH BARRETT BARRETT, 1845–1846. The tented with Two Contemporary Portraits of the Writers, and Two Carbengorary Portraits of the Writers, and Two Carbengorary Portraits of the Horors, Note by R. Byranders of the Greek Words, by F. G. Krevess, Esplanders of the Greek Words, Two Volumes, Crossing vo. Close, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gill Tops, 45–194, Hely Morocco, $9–30.

Many pool offshings a marke limited i terature from the two Brownings, he best busined as to be seen these poems, which are their greatest. This alliest configurates a the offs of one welf. But in a fuller one obsect that straight grades are given themselves by what we can tut ould the grades are side of those letters. As their union was imager, seed the section of the configuration. The letter, are the nest equal in the section of the rest which have been published for many is large of a real, i. In

We have read the shift row they are are, with growing astom-hunch, with sure events of the could final result produced on our minds is that the success of all one of the most procharge contribution are blanky here as who bear time has seen so Saturday B. 1813, London

We centure to this his limit to a which is at table and unbroken action of intuitive letters hit was a fixed at a liable people has ever been given to the world. They are not thing extraordinarily touching in the goal of his world his post above in which two poets play the particle his and he is not a fifth. London,

HARPITE & BROTHING PERLIPHER

ANY BRIEF SOR INCOME

part of the United States Considered to the second property of the United States Considered to the States of the United States of the property of the United States of the property of the United States of the property of the property of the United States of the property of the United States of the Unite

THE BRONTE NOVELS

By CHARLOTTE BRONTË (CURRER BELL)

Jane Eyre. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00; 8vq Paper 40 cents.

SHIRLEY. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE PROFESSOR. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

VILLETTE. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Almost all that we require in a novelist, the writer has—perception of character and knowledge of delineating it, picturesqueness, passion, and knowledge of life. Reality—deep, significant reality—is the characteristic of this book.—Fraser's Magazine.

By ANNE BRONTË (ACTON BELL)

THE TENANT OF WILDFELL HALL. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

We give our honest recommendation of "Wildfell Hall" as being the most interesting novel we have read for a month past.

—Athenœum, London.

By EMILY BRONTË (ELLIS BELL)

WUTHERING HEIGHTS. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

We strongly recommend it to all, for we can promise our readers that they never read anything like it before.—From a review by DOUGLAS JERROLD.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers NEW YORK AND LONDON

Any of the above works will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, Canada, or Mexico, on receipt of the price.

By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS

- EARLY LITTPES OF GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS TO JOHN'S DWIGHT: Brook Farm and Concord - Edited by George Willis Cooke. Post Svo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and GRI Top, $1-50.
- ARS RECTI VIVENDE: Being Essays contributed to "The Easy Chair." Post Svo. Cloth, $1-25
- ORATIONS AND ADDRESSES OF Ground Without Courts, Edited by Changles Ellor Nouron. Three Velonics. Syo, Cloth, Unout Edges and Gilt Tops, $3.50 each., Three quarter Calf, $47-25 per set.
- MOTLEY'S CORRESPONDENCE Edited by Greener With 1AM Currys, Two Volumes. With Portrait Svo. Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Half Calf, $11 50.
- FROM THE EASY CHAIR. First Series. With Portrait, 16mo, Cloth, $4-00. (American Essayists.)
- OTHER ESSAYS FROM THE EASY CHAIR Second Series, With Portrait. 16mo, Cloth, $1.00 (American Essayists)
- FROM THE EASY CHAIR. Third Series. With Portrait. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00; White and Gold, $1 25. (American Establish)
- LITERARY AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Post 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.
- *PRUE AND 1. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50; Illustrated Edition. 8vo, Illuminated Silk, $3.50.
- *LOTUS EATING, A Summer Book, Illustrated, 13mo, Cloth, $1,50.
- * NILE NOTES OF A HOWADII. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
- *THE HOWADH IN SYRIA. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50
- *THE POTHPHAR PAPERS. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1-50.
- STRUMPS A Novel. Himtrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
- JAMES BUSSELL, LOWELL. An Address. Blustrated. 82mo, Cloth, 50 cents. (Hack and White Series)
- WENDELL PHILLIP: A Eulogy. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents. * Set of Six Volumes, Half Calf, $20 00.

HARPER & DROTHIES, PUBLISHERS NEW YORK AND LONDON

** Any of the above works will be sent by mail, postage proposid, to any part of the United States, Canada, or Mexico, on receipt of the price.